ELIZABETH BARRETT
BROWNING

I have been in the meadows all the day,
And gathered there the nosegay that you see ;
Singing within myself as bird or bee
When such do field-work on a morn of May.

FOREWORD

IN every life where spirit and intellect truly blossom there are a few persons and a few events that stand out like fixed stars. Of these I have endeavored to speak. I have also tried to give a glimpse (that was mine) of the environment that played its part in the Evolution of a Soul.

No attempt has been made to tell all about the subject—there is more can be said !

I.

WRITERS of biography usually begin their preachments with the rather startling statement, "The subject of this memoir was born" . . . Here follows a date, name of place and a cheerful little Mrs. Gamp anecdote : this as preliminary to "launching forth,"

It was the merry Andrew Lang, I believe, who filed a general protest against these machine-made biographies, pleading that it was perfectly safe to assume the man was born ; and as for the time and place it mattered little. But the merry man was wrong, for Time and Place are often masters of Fate.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

For myself I rather like the good old-fashioned way of beginning at the beginning. But I will not tell where and when Elizabeth Barrett was born, for I do not know. And I am quite sure that her husband did not know. The encyclopædias waver between London and Herefordshire, just according as the writers felt in their hearts that genius should be produced in town or country. One man with opinions well ossified on this subject, having been challenged for his statement that Mrs. Browning was born at Hope End, rushed into print in a letter to the Gazette with the counter-check quarrelsome to the effect, "You might as well expect throstles to build nests on Fleet Street 'buses, as for folks of genius to be born in a big city." As apology for the man's ardor I will explain that he was a believer in the Religion of the East and held that spirits choose their own time and place for materialization.

Mrs. Ritchie, authorized by Mr. Browning, declared Burn Hill, Durham, the place, and March 6, 1809, the time. In reply, Mr. John H. Ingram brings forth a copy of the Tyne Mercury, for March 14, 1809, and points to this :

“ In London, the wife of Edward M. Barrett, of a daughter.”

Mr. Browning then comes forward with a fact that derricks cannot budge, i. e., “ Newspapers have ever had small regard for truth.” Then he adds, “ My wife was born March 6, 1806, at Carlton Hall, Durham, the residence of her father’s brother.” One might ha’ thought that would be the end on ’t, but it was n’t, for Mr. Ingram came out with this sharp rejoinder : “ Carlton Hall was not in Durham, but in Yorkshire. And I am authoritatively informed it did not become the residence of Mr. S. Moulton Barrett until some time after 1810. Mr. Browning’s latest suggestions in this matter cannot be accepted. In 1806, Mr. Edward Barrett, not yet twenty years of age, is scarcely likely to have already been the father of the two children assigned him."

And there the matter rests. Having told this much I shall proceed to launch forth.

The early years of Elizabeth Barrett's life were spent at Hope End, near Ledbury, Herefordshire. I visited the place and thereby added not only one day, but several to my life, for Ali counts not the days spent in the chase. There is a description of Hope End written by an eminent clergyman, to whom I was at once attracted by his literary style. This gentleman's diction contains so much clearness, force, and elegance that I cannot resist quoting him verbatim: "The residentiary buildings lie on the ascent of the contiguous eminences, whose projecting parts and bending declivities, modelled by nature, display astonishing harmoniousness. It contains an elegant profusion of wood, disposed in the most careless yet pleasing order; much of the park and its scenery is in view of the residence, from which vantage point it presents a most agreeable appearance to the enraptured beholder." So there you have it !

Here Elizabeth Barrett lived until she was twenty. She never had a childhood —'t was dropped out of her life in some way, and a Greek grammar inlaid instead. Of her mother we know little. She is never quoted ; never referred to ; her wishes were so whisperingly expressed that they have not reached us. She glides a pale shadow across the diary pages. Her husband's will was to her supreme ; his whim her conscience. We know that she was sad, often ill, that she bore eight children. She passed out seemingly unwept, unhonored, and unsung, after a married existence of sixteen years.

Elizabeth Barrett had the same number of brothers and sisters that Shakespeare had ; and we know no more of the seven Barretts who were swallowed by obliviou than we do of the seven Shakespeares that went not astray.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

Edward Moulton Barrett had a sort of fierce, passionate, jealous affection for his daughter Elizabeth. He set himself the task of educating her from her very babyhood. He was her constant companion, her tutor, adviser, friend. When six years old she studied Greek, and when nine made translations in verse. Mr. Barrett looked on this sort of thing with much favor, and tightened his discipline, reducing the little girl's hours for study to a system as severe as the laws of Draco. Of course the child's health broke. From her thirteenth year she appears to us like a beautiful spirit with an astral form; or she would, did we not perceive that this beautiful form is being racked with pain. No wonder some one has asked, "Where then was the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children?"

But this brave spirit did not much complain. She had a will as strong as her father's, and felt a Spartan pride in doing all that he asked and a little more. She studied, wrote, translated, read, and thought. And to spur her on and to stimulate her, Mr. Barrett published several volumes of her work—immature, pedantic work—but still it had a certain glow and gave promise of the things yet to come.

One marked event in the life of Elizabeth Barrett occurred when Hugh Stuart Boyd arrived at Hope End. He was a fine sensitive soul ; a poet by nature and a Greek scholar of repute. He came on Mr. Barrett's invitation to take Mr. Barrett's place as tutor. The young girl was confined to her bed through the advice of physicians ; Boyd was blind.

Here was at once a bond of sympathy. No doubt this break in the monotony of her life gave fresh courage to the fair young woman. The gentle sightless poet relaxed the severe hours of study. Instead of grim digging in musty tomes they talked : he sat by her bedside holding the thin hands (for the blind see by the sense of touch) and they talked for hours—or were silent, which served as well. Then she would read to the blind man and he would recite to her, for he had blind Homer's memory. She grew better, and the doctors said that if she had taken her medicine regularly and not insisted on getting up and walking about as guide for the blind man she might have gotten entirely well.

In that fine poem Wine of Cypress, addressed to Boyd, we see how she acknowledges his goodness. There is no wine equal to the wine of friendship; and love is only friendship—plus something else. There is nothing so hygienic as friendship.

Hell is a separation, and Heaven is only a going home to our friends.

Mr. Barrett's fortune was invested in sugar plantations in Jamaica. Through the emancipation of the blacks his fortune took to itself wings. He had to give up his splendid country home—to break old ties. It was decided that the family should move to London. Elizabeth had again taken to her bed. Four men bore the mattress on which she lay down the steps; one man might have carried her alone, for she weighed only eighty-five pounds, so they say.

C RABB ROBINSON, who knew everything and everybody, being very much such a man as John Kenyon, has left on record the fact that Mr. Kenyon had a face like a Benedictine monk, a wit that never lagged, a generous heart, and a tongue that ran like an Alpine cascade.

A razor with which you cannot shave may have better metal in it than one with a perfect edge. One has been sharpened and the other not. And I am very sure that the men who write best do not necessarily know the most ; fate has put an edge on them—that's all. A good kick may start a stone rolling, when otherwise it rests on the mountain side for a generation.

Kenyon was one type of the men who rest on the mountain side. He dabbled in poetry, wrote book reviews, collected rare editions, attended first nights, spoke mysteriously of "stuff" he was working on; and sometimes confidentially told his lady friends of his intention to bring it out when he had gotten it into shape, asking their advice as to bindings, etc.

This kind of men rarely bring out their stuff, for the reason that they never get it into shape. When they refer to the novel they have on the stocks they refer to a novel they intend to write. It is yet in the ink bottle. And there it remains—all for the want of one good kick—but perhaps it's just as well.

Yet these friendly beings are very useful members of society. They are brighter companions and better talkers than the men who exhaust themselves in creative work and favor their friends at odd times with choice samples of literary irritability. John Kenyon wrote a few bright little things but his best work was in the encouragement he gave to others. He sought out all literary lions and tamed them with his steady glance. They liked his prattle and good cheer and he liked them for many reasons. One of which was because he could go away and tell how he advised them about this, that, and the other. Then he fed them too.

And so unrivalled was Kenyon in this line that he won for himself the title of The Feeder of Lions. Now John Kenyon, rich, idle, bookish, and generous, saw in the magazines certain fine little poems by one Elizabeth Barrett. He also ascertained that she had published several books. Mr. Kenyon bought one of these volumes and sent it by a messenger with a little note to Miss Barrett telling how much he had enjoyed it, and craved that she would inscribe her name and his on the fly-leaf and return by bearer. Of course she complied with such a modest request so gracefully expressed; these things are balm to poets' souls. Next, Mr. Kenyon called to thank Miss Barrett for the autograph. Soon after he wrote to inform her of a startling fact that he had just discovered: they were kinsmen, cousins or something—a little removed, but cousins still. In a few weeks they wrote letters back and forth beginning thus: Dear Cousin.

And I am glad of this cousinly arrangement between lonely young people. They grasp at it; and it gives an excuse for a bit of closer relationship than could otherwise exist with propriety. Goodness me! is he not my cousin? of course he may call as often as he chooses. It is his right.

But let me explain here that at this time Mr. Kenyon was not so very young—that is he was not absurdly young: he was fifty. But men who really love books always have young hearts. Kenyon's father left him a fortune, no troubles had ever come his way and his was not the temperament that searches them out. He dressed young, looked young, acted young, felt young.

No doubt John Kenyon sincerely admired Elizabeth Barrett, and prized her work. And while she read his mind a deal more understandingly than he did her poems, she was grateful for his kindly attention and well-meant praise. He set about to get her poems into better magazines and find better publishers for her work. He was not a gifted poet himself, but to dance attendance on one afforded a gratification to his artistic impulse. He could not write sublime verse himself but he could tell others how. So Miss Barrett showed her poems to Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Kenyon advised that the P's be made bolder and the tails to the Q's be lengthened. He also bought her a new kind of MS. paper over which a quill pen would glide with glee; it was the kind Byron used. But best of all Mr. Kenyon brought his friends to call on Miss Barrett; and many of these friends were men with good literary instincts. The meeting with these strong minds was no doubt a great help to the little lady, shut up in a big house and living largely in dreams.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

Mary Russell Mitford was in London about this time on a little visit and of course was sought out by John Kenyon, who took her sight-seeing. She was fifty years old too ; she spoke of herself as an old maid but did n't allow others to. Friends always spoke of her as "Little Miss Mitford," not because she was little but because she acted so. Among other beautiful sights Mr. Kenyon wished to show gushing little Mary Mitford was a Miss Barrett who wrote things. So together they called on Miss Barrett.

Little Miss Mitford looked at the pale face in its frame of dark curls, lying back among the pillows. Little Miss Mitford bowed and said it was a fine day ; then she went right over and kissed Miss Barrett, and these two women held each other's hands and talked until Mr. Kenyon twisted nervously and hinted that it was time to go.

Miss Barrett had not been out for two months, but now these two insisted that she should go with them. The carriage was at the door, they would support her very tenderly, Mr. Kenyon himself would drive—so there could be no accidents and they would bring her back the moment she was tired. So they went, did these three, and as Mr. Kenyon himself drove there were no accidents.

I can imagine that James the coachman gave up the reins that day with only an inward protest, and after looking down and smiling reassurance Mr. Kenyon drove slowly towards the Park; Little Miss Mitford forgot her promise not to talk incessantly; and the “dainty white porcelain lady” brushed back the raven curls from time to time and nodded indulgently.

Not long ago I called at Number 74 Gloucester Place, where the Barretts lived. It is a plain, solid brick house, built just like the ten thousand other brick houses in London where well-to-do tradesmen live. The people who now occupy the house never heard of the Barretts and surely do not belong to a Browning Club. I was told that if I wanted to know anything about the place I should apply to the "Agent" whose name is 'Opkins and whose office is in Clifford Court, off Fleet Street. The house probably has not changed in any degree in these fifty years, since little Miss Mitford on one side and Mr. Kenyon on the other, tenderly helped Miss Barrett down the steps and into the carriage.

I lingered about Gloucester Place for an hour, but finding that I was being furtively shadowed by various servants, and discovering further that a policeman had been summoned to look after my case, I moved on.

That night after the ride Miss Mitford wrote a letter home and among other things she said: "I called to-day at a Mr. Barrett's. The eldest daughter is about twenty-five. She has some spinal affection, but she is a charming, sweet young woman who reads Greek as I do

French. She has published some translations from Æschylus and some striking poems. She is a delightful creature, shy, timid, and modest."

The next day Mr. Kenyon gave a little dinner in honor of Miss Mitford, who was the author of a great book called Our Village. That night when Miss Mitford wrote her usual letter to the folks down in the country, telling how she was getting along, she described this dinner party. She says: "Wordsworth was there—an adorable old man. Then there was Walter Savage Landor too, as splendid a person as Mr. Kenyon himself, but not so full of sweetness and sympathy. But best of all, the charming Miss Barrett, who translated the most difficult of the Greek plays—Prometheus Bound. She has written most exquisite poems, too, in almost every modern style. She is so sweet, and gentle, and so pretty that one looks at her as if she were some bright flower."

Then in another letter Miss Mitford

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

adds : " She is of a slight, delicate figure, with a shower of dark curls falling on either side of a most expressive face ; large tender eyes, richly fringed by dark lashes ; a smile like a sunbeam and such a look of youthfulness that I had some difficulty in persuading a friend that she was really the translator of Æschylus and the author of the Essay on Mind."

When Miss Mitford went back home she wrote Miss Barrett a letter 'most every day. She addresses her as " My Sweet Love," " My Dearest Sweet," and " My Sweetest Dear." She declares her to be the best, gentlest, strongest, sanest, noblest, and most spiritual of all living persons. And moreover she wrote these things to others and published them in reviews. She gave Elizabeth Barrett much good advice and some not so good. Among other things she says : " Your one fault, my dear, is obscurity. You must be simple and plain. Think of the stupidest person of your acquaintance, and when you have made your words so clear that you are sure he will understand you may venture to hope it will be understood by others.”

I hardly think that this advice caused Miss Barrett to bring her lines down to the level of the stupidest person she knew. She continued to write just as she chose. Yet she was grateful for Miss Mitford's glowing friendship, and all the pretty gush was accepted, although perhaps with good large pinches of the Syracuse product.

Of course there are foolish people who assume that gushing women are shallow, but this is jumping at conclusions. A recent novel gives us a picture of “a tall soldier,” who, in camp, was very full of brag and bluster. We are quite sure that when the fight comes on this man with the lubricated tongue will prove an arrant coward; we assume he will run at the first smell of smoke. But we are wrong—he stuck; and when the flag was carried down in the rush, he rescued it and bore it bravely so far to the front that when he came back he brought another—the tawdry red flag of the enemy!

I slip this in here just to warn hasty folk against the assumption that talkative people are necessarily vacant-minded. Man has a many-sided nature, and like the moon, reveals only certain phases at certain times. And as there is one side of the moon that is never revealed at all to dwellers on the planet Earth, so mortals may unconsciously conceal certain phases of soul-stuff from each other.

Miss Barrett seems to have written more letters and longer ones to Miss Mitford than to any of her other correspondents, save one. Yet she was aware of this rather indiscreet woman's limitations and wrote down to her understanding.

To Richard H. Horne she wrote freely and at her intellectual best. With this all 'round gifted man she kept up a correspondence for many years; and her letters now published in two stout volumes afford a literary history of the time. At the risk of being accused of lack of taste,

I wish to say that these letters of Miss Barrett's are a deal more interesting to me than any of her long poems. They reveal the many-sided qualities of the writer, and show the workings of her mind in various moods. Poetry is such an exacting form that it never allows the author to appear in dressing-gown and slippers; neither can he call over the back fence to his neighbor without loss of dignity.

Horne was author, editor, and publisher. His middle name was Henry, but following that peculiar penchant of the ink-stained fraternity to play flim-flam with their names, he changed the Henry to Hengist; so we now see it writ thus: R. Hengist Horne.

He found a market for Miss Barrett's wares. More properly he insisted that she should write certain things to fit certain publications in which he was interested. They collaborated in writing several books. They met very seldom, and their correspondence has a fine friendly flavor about it, tempered with a disinterestedness that is unique. They encourage each other, criticise each other. They rail at each other in witty quips and quirks, and at times the air is so full of gibes that it looks as if a quarrel were appearing on the horizon—no bigger than a man's hand—but the storm always passes in a gentle shower of refreshing compliments.

Meantime dodging in and out we see the handsome, gracious, and kindly John Kenyon.

Much of the time Miss Barrett lived in a darkened room, seeing no one but her nurse, the physician, and her father. Fortune had smiled again on Edward Barrett—a legacy had come his way, and although he no longer owned the black men in Jamaica, yet they were again working for him. Sugar-cane mills ground slow, but small.

The brilliant daughter had blossomed in intellect until she was beyond her teacher. She was so far ahead that he called to her to wait for him. He could read Greek ; she could compose in it. But she preferred her native tongue as every scholar should. Now, Mr. Barrett was jealous of the fame of his daughter. The passion of father for daughter, of mother for son—there is often something very lover-like in it—a deal of whimsy ! Miss Barrett's darkened room had been illumined by a light that the gruff and goodly merchant wist not of. Loneliness and solitude and physical pain and heart-hunger had taught her things that no book recorded nor tutor knew. Her father could not follow her ; her allusions were obscure, he said, wilfully obscure ; she was growing perverse.

Love is a pain at times. To ease the hurt the lover would hurt the beloved. He badgers her, pinches her, provokes her. One step more and he may kill her.

Edward Barrett's daughter, she of the raven curls and gentle ways, was reaching a point where her father's love was not her life. A good way to drive love away is to be jealous. He had seen it coming years before ; he brooded over it ; the calamity was upon him. Her fame was growing : someone called her the Shakespeare of women. First her books had been published at her father's expense ; next, editors were willing to run their own risks, and now messengers with bank-notes waited at the door and begged to exchange the bank-notes for MS. John Kenyon said, "I told you so," but Edward Barrett scowled. He accused her foolishly ; he attempted to dictate to her—she must use this ink or that. Why? Because he said so. He quarrelled with her to ease the love-hurt that was smarting in his heart.

Poor little pale-faced poet ! earthly success has nothing left for thee ! Thy thoughts, too great for speech, fall on dull ears. Even thy father, for whom thou first took up pen, doth not understand thee, and a mother's love thou hast never known. And fame without love—

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

how barren ! Heaven is thy home. Let slip thy thin, white hands on the thread of life and glide gently out at ebb of tide—out into the unknown. It cannot but be better than this—God understands ! Compose thy troubled spirit, give up thy vain hopes. See ! thy youth is past, little woman ; look closely ! there are grey hairs in thy locks, thy face is marked with lines of care, and have I not seen signs of winter in thy veins ? Earth holds naught for thee. Come, take thy pen and write, just a last good-bye, a tender farewell, such as thou alone canst say. Then fold thy thin hands, and make peace with all by passing out and away, out and away—God understands !

III.

ELIZABETH BARRETT was thirty-seven, and Miss Mitford, up to London from the country for a couple of days, wrote home that she had lost her winsome beauty.

John Kenyon had turned well into sixty, but he carried his years in a jaunty way. He wore a moss-rose bud in the lapel of his well-fitting coat. His linen was immaculate, and the only change people saw in him was that he wore spectacles in place of a monocle.

The physicians allowed Mr. Kenyon to visit the Darkened Room whenever he chose, for he never stayed so very long, neither was he ever the bearer of bad news.

Did the greatest poetess of the age (temporarily slightly indisposed) know one

Browning—Robert Browning, a writer of verse? Why, no; she had never met him, but of course she knew of him, and had read everything he had written. He had sent her one of his books once. He surely was a man of brilliant parts—so strong and far-seeing! He lives in Italy, with the monks, they say. What a pity that English people do not better appreciate him!

“But he may succeed yet,” said Mr. Kenyon. “He is not old.”

“Oh, of course such genius must some day be recognized. But he may be gone then—how old did you say he was?”

Mr. Kenyon had not said; but he now explained that Mr. Browning was thirty-four, that is to say, just the age of himself, ahem! Furthermore, Mr. Browning did not live in Italy—that is, not now, for at that present moment he was in London. In fact, Mr. Kenyon had lunched with him an hour before. They had talked of Miss Barrett (for who else was there among women worth talking of!)

and Mr. Browning had expressed a wish to see her. Mr. Kenyon had expressed a wish that Mr. Browning should see her, and now if Miss Barrett would express a wish that Mr. Browning should call and see her, why, Mr. Kenyon would fetch him—doctors or no doctors.

And he fetched him.

And I 'm glad, are n't you ?

Now Robert Browning was not at all of the typical poet type. In stature he was rather short ; his frame was compact and muscular. In his youth he had been a wrestler—carrying away laurels of a different sort from those which he was to wear later. His features were inclined to be heavy ; in repose his face was dull and there was no fire in his glance. He wore loose-fitting plain grey clothes, a slouch hat, and thick-soled shoes. At first look you would have said he was a well-fed, well-to-do country squire. On closer acquaintance you would have been impressed with his dignity, his perfect poise, and fine reserve. And did you come to know him well enough you would have seen that beneath that seemingly phlegmatic outside there was a spiritual nature so sensitive and tender that it responded to all the finer thrills that play across the souls of men. Yet if there ever was a man who did not wear his heart upon his sleeve for daws to peck at, it was Robert Browning. He was clean, wholesome, manly, healthy inside and out. He was master of self.

Of course the gentle reader is sure that the next act will show a tender love scene. And were I dealing with the lives of Peter Smith and Martha the milkmaid, the gentle reader might be right.

But the love of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett is an instance of the Divine Passion. Take off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground! This man and woman had gotten well beyond the first flush of youth; there was a joining of intellect and soul which approaches the ideal. I cannot imagine anything so preposterous as a "proposal" passing between them; I cannot conceive a condition of hesitancy and timidity leading up to a dam-bursting "avowal." They met, looked into each other's eyes, and each there read his fate: no coyness, no affectation, no fencing—they loved. Each at once felt a heart-rest in the other. Each had at last found the other self.

That exquisite series of poems, Sonnets from the Portuguese, written by Elizabeth Barrett before her marriage and presented to her husband afterward, were all told to him over and over by the look from her eyes, the pressure of her hands, and in gentle words (or silence) that knew neither shame nor embarrassment.

And now it seems to me that somewhere in these pages I said that friendship was essentially hygienic. I wish to make that remark again, and to put it in italics. The Divine Passion implies the most exalted form of friendship that man can imagine.

Elizabeth Barrett ran up the shades and flung open the shutters. The sunlight came dancing through the apartment, flooding each dark corner and driving out all the shadows that lurked therein. It was no longer a darkened room.

The doctor was indignant: the nurse resigned.

Miss Mitford wrote back to the country that Miss Barrett was "really looking better than she had for years."

As for poor Edward Moulton Barrett—he raved. He tried to quarrel with Robert Browning, and had there been only a callow youth with whom to deal Browning would have simply been kicked down the steps, and that would have been an end of it. But Browning had an even pulse, a calm eye, and a temper that was imperturbable. His will was quite as strong as Mr. Barrett's.

And so it was just a plain runaway match—the ideal thing after all. One day when the father was out of the way they took a cab to Marlybone Parish Church and were married. The bride went home alone, and it was a week before her husband saw her; because he would not be a hypocrite and go ask for her by her maiden name. And had he gone, rung the bell and asked to see Elizabeth Barrett Browning no one would have known whom he wanted. At the end of the week the bride stole down the steps alone, leading her dog Flush by a string, and met her lover-husband on the corner. Next day they wrote back from Calais, asking forgiveness and craving blessings after the good old custom of Gretna Green. But Edward Moulton Barrett did not forgive—still, who cares!

Yet we do care, too, for we regret that this man, so strong and manly in many ways, could not be reconciled to this exalted love. Old men who nurse wrath are pitiable sights. Why could not Mr. Barrett have followed the example of John Kenyon?

Kenyon commands both our sympathy

and admiration. When the news came to him that Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett were gone, it is said that he sobbed like a youth to whom has come a great, strange sorrow. For months he was not known to smile, yet after a year he visited the happy home in Florence. When John Kenyon died he left by his will fifty thousand dollars "to my beloved and loving friends, Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett, his wife."

The old-time novelists always left their couples at the church door. It was not safe to follow further—they wished to make a pleasant story. It seems meet to take our leave of the bride and groom at the church: life often ends there. However, it sometimes is the place where life really begins. It was so with Elizabeth Barrett and Robert Browning—they had merely existed before; now they began to live.

Much, very much has been written concerning this ideal mating, and of the life of Mr. and Mrs. Browning in Italy. But why should I write of the things of which George William Curtis, Kate Field, Anthony Trollope, and James T. Fields have written? No, we will leave the happy pair at the altar, in Marlybone Parish Church, and while the organ peals the wedding-march we will tiptoe softly out.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning

MADAME GUYON

To me remains nor place nor time ;
My country is in every clime ;
I can be calm and free from care,
On any shore, since God is there.

While place we seek or place we shun,
The soul finds happiness in none ;
But with a God to guide our way,
'T is equal joy to go or stay.

Could I be cast where thou art not,
That were indeed a dreadful lot ;
But regions none remote I call,
Secure of finding God in all.

GOD IS EVERYWHERE.

MADAME GUYON.

JEANNE MARIE BOUVIER sat one day writing at her little oaken desk, when her father approached and, kissing her very gently on the forehead, told her that he had arranged for her marriage, and that her future husband was soon to arrive. Jeanne's fingers lost their cunning, the pen dropped; she arose to her feet, but her tongue was dumb.

Jeanne Marie was only sixteen, but you would have thought her twenty, for she was tall and dignified—she was as tall as her father: she was five feet nine. She had a splendid length of limb, hips that gave only a suggestion of curve line, a slender waist, shapely, well-poised neck, and a head that might have made a Juno envious. The face and brow were not those of Venus—rather they belonged to Minerva; for the nose was large, the chin full, and the mouth no pea's blossom. Her hair was light brown, but when the sun shone on it people said it was red. It was as generous in quantity and unruly in habit as the westerly wind. Her eyes were all colors, changing according to her mood. Withal, she had freckles, and no one was ever so rash as to call her pretty.

Madame Guyon

Jeanne's father had not kissed her for two years, for he was a very busy man: he had no time for soft demonstration. He was rich, he was religious, and he was looked upon as a model citizen in every way.

The daughter had grown like a sunflower, and her intellect had unfolded as a moss-rose turns from bud to blossom. This splendid girl had thought and studied and dreamed dreams. She had imagined she heard a voice speaking to her : Arise, Maiden, and prepare thee, for I have a work for thee to do !

Madame Guyon

Her wish and her prayer was to enter a convent, and after consecrating herself to God in a way that would allow of no turning back, to go forth and give to men and women the messages that had come to her. And these things filled the heart of the worthy bourgeois with alarm ; so he said to his wife one day, " That girl will be a foot taller than I am in a year, and even now, when I give her advice, she opens her big eyes and looks at me in a way that thins my words to whey. She will get us into trouble yet ! she may disgrace us. I think—I think I 'll find her a husband."

Yet that would not have been a difficult task. She was loved by a score of youths, but had never spoken to any of them. They stood at corners and sighed as she walked by ; and others, with religious bent, timed her hours for mass and took positions in church from whence they could see her kneel. Others still patrolled the narrow street that led to her home, with hopes that she might pass that way, so that they might touch the hem of her garment.

These things were naught to Jeanne Marie. She had never yet seen a man for whose intellect she did not have both a pity and a contempt.

But Claude Bouvier did not pick a husband for his daughter from among the simple youths of the town. He wrote to a bachelor friend, Jacques Guyon by name, and told him he could have the girl if he wanted her—that is, after certain little preliminaries had been arranged.

Now this Jacques Guyon had been at the Bouvier residence on a visit three months before, and had looked the lass over stealthily with peculiar interest, and had intimated that if Monsieur Bouvier wished to get rid of her it could be brought about. So after some weeks had passed, Monsieur bethought him of the offer of Jacques Guyon, and he concluded that inasmuch as Guyon was rich and respectable it would be a good match.

Madame Guyon

So he wrote to Guyon, and Guyon replied he would come, probably within a fortnight—just as soon as his rheumatism got better.

Claude Bouvier read the letter, and, walking into the next room, surprised Jeanne Marie by kissing her tenderly on her forehead—all as herein truthfully recorded.

II.

SO Jacques Guyon came, came in his carriage with two servants riding on horseback in front and another riding on horseback behind. Jeanne Marie sat on the floor, tailor fashion, up in her little room of the old stone house and peeked out of the diamond-paned gable window very cautiously; and she was sorely disappointed.

In some of her dreams (and these dreams she thought were very bad) she had pictured a lover coming alone on a foam-flecked charger; and as the steed paused the rider leaped lightly from saddle to ground, kissing his hand to her as she peeked through the curtains. For he discovered her when she hoped he would not, but she did not care much if he did.

But Monsieur Guyon's eyes did not search the windows. He got out of the carriage with difficulty and his breath came wheezy and short as he mounted the steps. His complexion was dusty blue, his nose tinged with carmine, his eyes watery, and his girth aldermanic. He was growing old, and saddest of all he was growing old rebelliously and therefore ungracefully—dyeing his whiskers purple.

That evening when Jeanne Marie was introduced to Monsieur Guyon at dinner she found him very polite and very gracious. His breeches were real black velvet and his stockings were silk, and the buckles on his shoes polished silver and the frill of his shirt was finest lace. His conversation was directed mostly to Jeanne's father, so Jeanne did not feel nearly so uncomfortable as she had expected.

The next day a notary came and long papers were written out, and red and green seals placed on them, and then everybody held up his right hand as the notary mumbled something, and then they all signed their names. The room seemed to be teetering up and down, and it looked quite like rain. Monsieur Bouvier stood on his tiptoes and again kissed his daughter on the forehead and Monsieur Guyon, taking her hand, lifted the long slender fingers to his lips, and told her that she would soon be a great lady and the mistress of a splendid mansion and have everything that one needed to make one happy.

And so they were married by a bishop, with two priests and three curates to assist. The ceremony was held at the great stone church ; and as the procession came out, the verger had a hard time to keep the crowd back, so that the little girls in white could go before and strew flowers in their pathway. The organ pealed, and the chimes clanged and rang as if the tune and the times were out of joint ; then other bells from other parts of the old town answered, and across the valley rang mellow and soft the chapel bell of Montargis Castle.

Madame Guyon

Jeanne was seated in the carriage—how she got there she never knew; by her side sat Jacques Guyon. The postboys were lashing their horses into a savage run, like devils running away with the souls of innocents, and behind clattered the mounted liveried servant. People on the sidewalks waved good-byes and called God-bless-yous. Soon the sleepy old town was left behind and the horses slowed down to a lazy trot. Jeanne looked back, like Lot's wife: only a church spire could be seen. She hoped that she might be turned into a pillar of salt—but she was n't. She crouched into the corner of the seat and cried a good honest cry.

Jacques Guyon smiled and muttered to himself: "Her father said she was a bit stubborn, but I'll see that she gets over it!"

And this was over three hundred years ago. It does n't seem like it, but it was.

III.

READ the lives of great men and you will come to the conclusion that it is harder to find a gentleman than a genius. While the clock ticks off the seconds, count, within five minutes, on your fingers if you can five such gentlemen as Sir Philip Sidney ! Of course I know before you speak that Fénelon will be first on your tongue. Fénelon, the low-voiced, the mild, the sympathetic, the courtly, the gracious ! Fénelon, favored by the gods with beauty and far-reaching intellect ! Fénelon who knew the gold of silence. Fénelon on whose lips dwelt grace, and who by the magic of his words had but to speak to be believed and be beloved.

When Louis the Little made that most audacious blunder which cost France

Madame Guyon

millions in treasure and untold loss in men and women, Fénelon wrote to the Prime Minister: "These Huguenots have many virtues that must be acknowledged and conserved. We must hold them by mildness. We cannot produce conformity by force. Converts made in this manner are hypocrites. No power is great enough to bind the mind—thought forever escapes. Give civil liberty to all, not by approving all religions, but by permitting in patience what God allows."

"You shall go as missionary to these renegades!" was the answer—half ironical, half earnest.

"I will go only on one condition."

"And that is?"

"That from my province you withdraw all armed men—all sign of compulsion of every sort!"

Fénelon was of noble blood, but his sympathies were ever with the people. The lowly, the weak, the oppressed, the persecuted—these were ever the object of his solicitude—these were first in his mind.

It was in prison that Fénelon first met Madame Guyon. Fénelon was thirty-seven, she was forty. He occasionally preached at Montargis, and while there had heard of her goodness, her piety, her fervor, her resignation. He had small sympathy for many of her peculiar views, but now she was sick and in prison and he went to her and admonished her to hold fast and be of good cheer.

Twelve years before this Madame Guyon had been left a widow. She was the mother of five children—two were dead. The others were placed under the care of kind kinsmen; and Madame Guyon went forth to give her days to study and teaching. This action of placing her children partially in the care of others has been harshly criticised. But there is one phase of the subject that I have never seen commented upon—and that is that a mother's love for her offspring bears a certain ratio to the love she bore their father. Had Madame Guyon ever carried in her arms a love-child, I cannot conceive of her allowing this child to be cared for by others—no matter how competent.

The favor that had greeted Madame Guyon wherever she went was very great. Her animation and devout enthusiasm won her entrance into the homes of the great and noble everywhere. She organized societies of women that met for prayer and conversation on exalted themes. The burden of her philosophy was "Quietism"—the absolute submission of the human soul to the will of God. Give up all, lay aside striving, all reaching out, all unrest, cease penance and lie low in the Lord's hand. He doeth all things well. Make life one continual prayer for holiness—wholeness—harmony; and thus all good will come to us—we attract the good; we attract God—He is our friend—His spirit dwells with us. She taught of power through repose, and told that you can never gain peace by striving for it like fury.

Madame Guyon

This philosophy, stretching out in limitless ramifications, bearing on every phase and condition of life, touched everywhere with mysticism, afforded endless opportunity for thought.

It is the same philosophy that is being expressed by thousands of prominent men and women to-day. It embraced all that is vital and best in our so-called "advanced thought"; for in good sooth none of our new "liberal sects" have anything that has not been taught before in olden time.

But Madame Guyon's success was too great. The guardians of a dogmatic religion are ever on the scent for heresy. They are jealous, and fearful, and full of alarm lest their "institution" shall topple. Quietism was making head, and throughout France the name of Madame Guyon was becoming known. She went from town to town, and from city to city, and gave courses of lectures. Women flocked to hear her, they organized clubs. Preachers sometimes appeared and argued with her, but by the high fervor of her speech she quickly silenced them. Then they took revenge by thundering sermons against her after she had gone. As she travelled she left in her wake a pyrotechnic display of elocutionary denunciation. They dared her to come back and fight it out. The air was full of challenges. One prelate was good enough to say: "This woman may teach primitive Christianity—but if people find God everywhere, what's to become of us!"

And although the theme is as great as Fate and as serious as Death, one cannot suppress a smile to think how the fear of losing their job has ever caused men to run violently to and fro and up and down in the earth, crying peace, peace, when there is no peace.

Now it was the denunciation and wild demonstration of her fearing foes that advertised the labors of Madame Guyon. For strong people are not so much advertised by their loving friends as by their rabid enemies.

Madame Guyon

This happened quite a while ago ; but as mankind moves in a circle (and not always a spiral, either) it might have happened yesterday. Make the scene Ohio : slip Bossuet out and Dr. Buckley in ; condense the virtues of Miss Willard and Miss Anthony into one, and let this one stand for Madame Guyon ; call it New Transcendentalism, dub the Madame a New Woman, and there you have it !

But with this difference—petitions to the President of the United States to arrest this female offender and shut her up in the Chicago jail, indefinitely, after a mock trial, would avail not. Yet persecution has its compensation, and the treatment that Madame Guyon received emphasized the truths she taught and sent them ringing through the schools and salons and wherever thinking men gathered themselves together. Yes, persecution has its compensation. In its state of persecution a religion is pure, if ever ; its decline begins when its prosperity commences. Prosperous men are never wise and seldom good. Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you.

Surely, persecution has its compensation ! When Madame Guyon was sick and in prison was she not visited by Fénelon ? Ah, 't was worth the cost. Sympathy is the first attribute of love as well as its last. And I am not sure but that sympathy is love's own self, vitalized mayhap by some divine actinic ray. Only a thorn-crowned bleeding Christ could win the adoration of a world. Only the souls who have suffered are well loved. Thus does Golgotha find its recompense. Hark ye and take courage, ye who are in bonds ! Gracious spirits, seen or unseen, will minister to ye now, where otherwise they would have passed without a sign !

But from the day Fénelon met Madame Guyon his fortune began to decline. People looked at him askance. By a grim chance he was made one of a committee of three to investigate the charges brought against the woman. The court took a year for its task. Fénelon read everything that Madame Guyon had published, conversed much with her, inquired into her history and when asked for his verdict said—I find no fault in her.

Madame Guyon

He talked with Madame de Maintenon, and Madame de Maintenon talked with the King, and the offender was released.

Soon Fénelon began to utter in his sermons the truths that he had learned from Madame Guyon. And he gave her due credit. He explained that she was a good Catholic—that she loved the Church—that she lived up to all the Church taught, and besides knowing all that churchmen knew she knew many things beside.

Have a care, Archbishop of Cambrai! Enemies are upon thy track. Defend not defenceless womanhood: knowest thou not what they have said of her? Speak what thou art taught and keep thy inmost thoughts for thyself alone. Have a care, Fénelon! thy bishopric hangs by a spider's thread.

The years kept slipping past as the years will. Twelve summers had come, and twelve times had autumn leaves known their time to fall. Madame Guyon was again in prison. A stranger was Archbishop of Cambrai: Fénelon no longer a counsellor of kings—a tutor of royalty. His voice was silenced, his pen chained. He was allowed to retire to a rural parish. There he lived with the peasants—revered, beloved. The country where he dwelt was battle scarred and bleeding; the smoke of devastation still hung over it. Not a family but had been robbed of its best. Death had stalked rampant. Fénelon shared the poverty of the people, their lowliness, their sorrows. All the tragedy of their life was his; he said to them, “I know I know!”

Madame Guyon

Twelve years of Madame Guyon’s life were spent in prison. Toward the last she was allowed to live in nominal freedom. But despotism, with savage leer and stealthy step, saw that Fénelon was kept far away. In those declining days, when the shadows were lengthening toward the east, her time and talents were given to teaching the simple rudiments of knowledge to the peasantry, to alleviating their material wants and ministering to the sick. It was a forced retirement, and yet it was a retirement every way in accord with her desires. But in spite of the persecution that followed her, and the obloquy heaped upon her name, and the bribe of pardon if she would but recant, she never retracted nor wavered in her inward or outward faith, even in the estimation of a hair. The firm reticence as to the supreme secrets of her life, and her steadfast loyalty to that which she believed was truth, must ever command the affectionate admiration of those who prize integrity of mind, who hold fast to the divinity of love, and believe in the things unseen which are eternal.

IV.

THE town of Montargis is one day's bicycle journey from Paris. As for the road, though one be a way-faring man and from the States he could not err therein. You simply follow the Seine as if you were intent on discovering its source, keeping to the beautiful highway that follows the winding stream. And what a beautiful clear, clean bit of water it is ! In Paris your washerwoman takes your linen to the river, just as they did in the days of Pharoah, and the bundle comes back sweet as the breath of June. Imagiue the result of such recklessness in Chicago !

But as I rode out of Paris that bright May-day it seemed Monday all along the way ; for dames with baskets balanced on their heads were making their way to the water-side, followed by troops of barefoot or sabot-shod children. There was one fine young woman with a baby in her arms, and the innocent first-born was busily taking its breakfast as the mother walked calmly along, bearing on her well-poised head the family wash. And a mile farther on, as if she had seen her rival and gone her one better, was another woman with a two-year-old cherub perched secure on top of the gently swaying basket, proud as a cardinal about to be consecrated. It was a study in balancing that I have never seen before or since ; and I only ask those to believe it who know things so true that they dare not tell them. As the day wore on, I saw that the wash was being completed, for the garments were spread out on the greenest of green grass, or on the bushes that lined the way. By ten o'clock I was nearing Fontainebleau and the clothes were nearly ready to take in ; but not quite. For while waiting for the warm sun and the gentle breeze to dry them, the thrifty dames, who were French and make soup out of everything, put in the time by laundering the children. It seemed like that economic stroke of good housewives who use the soapy wash-water for scrubbing the kitchen floor. There they were, dozens of hopefuls on whom the fate of the nation rested, creepers to ten-year-olds being scrubbed and dipped, or playing parlez-vous tag in lieu of towel, as innocent of clothes as Carlyle's imaginary House of Lords.

And so I passed off from the road that traced the Seine to a road that kept company with the canal. I followed the tow-path, even in spite of warnings that 't was 'gainst the law. It was a one-horse canal, for many of the gaily painted boats were drawn only by a single shaggy-limbed Percheron. The boats were sharp-prowed and narrow; and on some were bare-headed women knitting, and men carving curious things out of blocks of wood, as they journeyed. And I said to myself

if "it is the pace that kills" these people are making a strong bid for immortality. I hailed the lazily moving craft, waving my hat, and the slow-going tourists called back cheerily.

By-and-by I came to a great, wide plain that stretched away like a tideless summer sea. The wheat and lentils and pulse were planted in long strips. In one place I thought I could trace the good old American flag (that you never really love unless you are on a foreign shore) made by alternate strips of millet and peas, with a goodly patch of cabbages in the corner for stars. But possibly this was imagination,—for I had been thinking that in a week it would be the Fourth of July and I was far from home—in a land where firecrackers are unknown.

Coming to a little rise of ground, I could see, lying calm and quiet amid the world of rich growing grain, the town of Montargis. Across on the blue hillside was Montargis Castle, framed in a mass of foliage. I stopped to view the scene and the echo of vesper bells came pealing gently over the miles, as the nodding poppies at my feet bowed reverently in the breeze.

Villages in France viewed from a distance seem so restful and idyllic. There is no sound of strife, no trace of rivalry, no vain pride; only white houses—the homes of good men and gentle women, and cherub children; and all of the church steeples truly point to God. Yet on closer view—but what of that!

When I reached the town, the church whose spire I had seen from the distance beckoned me first. I turned off from the wide thoroughfare, intending just to get a glance at the outside of the building as I passed. But the great iron gates thrown invitingly open, and a rusty, dusty dog of Flanders lying in the entry waiting for his master, told me that there was service within. So I entered, passing through the noiseless swinging door, and into the dim twilight of the house of prayer. A score of people were there, and standing in the aisle was a white-robed priest. He was speaking, and his voice came so gently, so sure withal, so exquisitely modulated, that I paused and leaning against a pillar, listened. I think it was the first time I ever heard a preacher speaking in a large church who did not speak so loud that an echo chased his sentences round and round the vaulted dome and strangled the sense. The tone was conversational and the manner so free from canting conventionality that I moved up closer to get a view of the face.

It was too dark to see well, but I came under the spell of the man's earnest eloquence. The sacred stillness, the falling night, the odor from incense and banks of flowers piled about the feet of an image of the Holy Virgin—evidently brought by the peasantry, having nothing else to give—made a combination of melting conditions that would have subdued a heart of stone.

The preacher ceased to speak, and as he raised his hands in benediction I involuntarily, with the other worshippers, knelt on the stone floor and bowed my head in silent reverie.

Madame Guyon

Suddenly I was aroused by a crashing noise at my elbow, and glancing round saw that an old man near me had merely dropped his cane. A heavy cudgel it was, that falling on the stone flagging sent a thundering reverberation through the vaulted chambers.

The worshippers were slipping out, one by one, and soon no one was left but the old man of the cudgel and myself. He wore wooden shoes, and was holding the cord-wood fast between his knees, rolling his hat nervously in his big hands. "He's a stranger, too," I said to myself, "he is the man who owns the rusty dog of Flanders, and he is waiting to give the priest some message!"

I leaned over towards my neighbor and asked: "The priest—what is his name?"

"Father Francis, Monsieur!" and the old man swayed back and forward in his seat as if moved by some inward emotion, still fingering his hat.

Just then the priest came out from behind the altar, wearing a black robe instead of the white one. He moved down with a sort of quiet majesty straight towards us. We arose as one man ; it was as though someone had pressed a button.

Father Francis walked by me, bowing slightly, and shook hands with my old neighbor. They stood talking in an undertone.

A last struggling ray of light from the dying sun came in over the chancel and flooded the great room for an instant. It allowed me to get a good look at the face of the priest. As I stood there staring at him I heard him say to the old man as he bade him good-bye, " Yes, tell her I'll be there in the morning."

Then he turned to me and I was still staring. And as I stared I was repeating to myself the words the people said when Dante used to pass—"There is the man who has been in hell!"

Madame Guyon

“You are an Englishman?” said Father Francis to me pleasantly as he held out his hand.

“Yes,” I said, “I am an Englishman—that is, no—an American!”

I was wondering if he really heard me make that Dante remark; and anyway, I had been rudely staring at him and listening with both ears to his conversation with the old man. I tried to roll my hat, and had I a cudgel I would surely have dropped it; and with it all I wondered if the dog of Flanders waiting outside was not getting impatient for me!

“Oh, an American! I’m glad—I have very dear friends in America!”

Then I saw that Father Francis did not look so much like the exiled Florentine as I had thought, for his smile was winning as that of a woman, the corners of his mouth did not turn down, and the nose had not the Roman curve. Dante was an exile: this man was at home—and would have been, anywhere.

He was tall, slender, and straight; he must have been sixty years old, but the face in spite of its furrows was singularly handsome. Grave, yet not depressed, it showed such feminine delicacy of feeling, such grace, such high intellect, that I stood and gazed as I might at a statue in bronze. But plain to see, he was a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief. The face spoke of one to whom might have come a great tribulation, and who by accepting it had purchased redemption for all time from all the petty troubles of earth.

“You must stay here as long as you wish, and you will come to our old church again, I hope!” said the Father. He smiled, nodded his head and started to leave me alone.

“Yes, yes, I’ll come again—I’ll come in the morning, for I want to talk with you about Madame Guyon—she was married in this church they told me—is that true?” I clutched a little. Here was a man I could not afford to lose—one of the Elect!

Madame Guyon

“Oh, yes, that was a long time ago though. Are you interested in Madame Guyon? I am glad—not to know Fénelon seems a misfortune. He used to preach from that very pulpit, and Madame was baptized at that font and confirmed here. I have pictures of them both; and I have their books—one of the books is a first edition. Do you care for such things?”

When I was broke in London, in the fall of Eighty-nine! Do I care for such things? I cannot recall what I said, but I remembered that this brown-skinned priest with his liquid black eyes, and the look of sorrow on his handsome face, stood out before me like the picture of a saint.

I made an engagement to meet him the next morning, when he bethought him of his promise to the old man of the cudgel and wooden shoes.

“Come now then—come with me now. My house is just next door!”

And so we walked up the main aisle of the old church, around the altar where Madame Guyon used to kneel, and by a crooked little passage-way entered a house fully as old as the church. A woman who might have been as old as the house was setting the table in a little dining-room. She looked up at me through brass-rimmed spectacles, and without orders or any one saying a word she whisked off the table-cloth, replaced it with a snowy clean one, and put on two plates instead of one. Then she brought in toasted brown bread and tea, and a steaming dish of lentils and fresh picked berries in a basket all lined with green leaves.

It was not a very sumptuous repast, but 't was enough. Afterward I learned that Father Francis was a vegetarian. He did not tell me so, neither did he apologize for absence of fermented drink, nor for his failure to supply tobacco and pipes.

Now I have heard that there be priests who hold in their cowed heads choice

Madame Guyon

recipes for spiced wines and who carry hidden away in their hearts, all the mysteries of the chafing-dish; but Father Francis was not one of these. His form was thin, but the bronze of his face was the bronze that comes from red corpuscles, and the strongly corded neck and calloused bony hands told of manly abstinence and exercise in the open air, and sleep that follows peaceful thoughts—knowing no chloral.

After the meal, Father Francis led the way to his little study upstairs. He showed me his books and read to me from his one solitary "First Edition." Then he unlocked a little drawer in an old chiffonier and brought out a package all wrapped in chamois. This parcel held two miniature portraits, one of Fénelon and one of Madame Guyon.

"That picture of Fénelon belonged to Madame Guyon. He had it painted for her and sent it to her while she was in prison at Vincennes. The other I bought in Paris—I do not know its history."

Madame Guyon

The good priest had work to do, and let me know it very gently, thus : " You have come a long way, brother, the road was rough—I know you must be weary. Come, I'll show you to your room."

He lighted a candle and took me to a bedroom at the end of the hall. It was a little room, very clean, but devoid of all ornament, save a picture of the Madonna and her Babe, that hung over the head of the little iron bedstead. It was a painting—not very good. I think Father Francis painted it himself ; the face of the Holy Mother was very human—divinely human—as motherhood should be.

Father Francis was right : the way had been rough and I was tired.

The treetops sang a cooing lullaby and the night winds sighed solemnly as they wandered through the hallway and open doors. It did not take me long to go to sleep. Later the wind blew up fresh and cool. I was too sleepy to get up and hunt for more covering and yet

I was cold as I curled up in a knot and dreamed I was first mate with Peary on an expedition in search of the North Pole. And the last I remember was a vision of a grey-robed priest tiptoeing across the stone floor; of his throwing over me a heavy blanket and then hastily tiptoeing out again.

The matin bells, or the birds, or both, awoke me early, but when I got down stairs I found my host had preceded me. His fine face looked fresh and strong, and yet I wondered when he had slept.

After breakfast the old housekeeper hovered near: "What is it, Margaret?" said the Father, gently.

"You have n't forgotten your engagement?" asked the woman, with just a quaver of anxiety.

"Oh no, Margaret"; then turning to me, "Come, you shall go with me—we will talk of Fénelon and Madame Guyon as we walk. It is eight miles and back<sup>d</sup> but you will not mind the distance. Oh, did n't I tell you where I'm going? You saw the old man at the church last night—it is his daughter—she is dying—dying of consumption. She has not been a good girl. She went away to Paris, three years ago, and her parents never heard from her. We tried to find her but could not ; and now she has come home of her own accord—come home to die. I baptized her twenty years ago—how fast the time has flown !”

The priest took a stout staff from the corner, and handing me its mate we started away. Down the white, dusty highway we went ; out on the stony road where yesterday, as the darkness gathered, trudged an old man in wooden shoes—at his heels a dog of Flanders.

HARRIET MARTINEAU

You better live your best and act your best and think your best to-day; for to-day is the sure preparation for to-morrow and all the other to-morrows that follow.

Life's Uses.

Very truly yours

H. Martineau.

I.

I BELIEVE it was Thackeray who once expressed a regret that Harriet Martineau had not shown better judgment in choosing her parents.

She was born into one of those big families where there is not love enough to go 'round. The mother was a robustious woman with a termagant temper; she was what you call "practical." She arose each morning like Solomon's ideal wife while it was yet dark, and proceeded to set her house in order. She made the children go to bed when they were not sleepy and get up when they were. There was no beauty sleep in that household,

Barriec Martineau

not even forty winks ; and did any member prove recreant and require a douse of cold water, not only did he get the douse but he also heard quoted for a year and a day that remark concerning the sluggard, " A little sleep, a little slumber, and a little folding of the hands to sleep—so shall thy poverty come as one that travel-eth and thy want as an armed man."

This big, bustling amazon was never known to weep but once, and that was when Lord Nelson died. To show any emotion would have been to reveal a weakness, and a caress would have been proof positive of folly. Life was a stern business and this earth journey a warfare. She cooked, she swept, she scrubbed, she sewed.

And although she withheld every loving word and kept back all demonstration of affection, yet her children were always well cared for : they were well clothed, they had plenty to eat, and a warm place to sleep. And in times of sickness this mother would send all others to rest and watch by the bedside until the shadows stole away and the sunrise came again. I wonder where you have lived all your life if you never knew a woman like that?

In the morning as soon as the breakfast things were done and the men folks had gone to the cloth factory, Mrs. Martineau would marshal her daughters in the sitting-room to sew. And there they sewed for four hours every forenoon for years and years; and as they sewed someone would often read aloud to them, for Mrs. Martineau believed in education—education gotten on the wing.

Sewing machines and knitting machines have done more to emancipate women than all the preachers. Think of the days when every garment worn by men, women, and children was made by the never-resting hands of women!

And as the girls in that thrifty Norwich household sewed and listened to the reader they occasionally spoke in monotone of what was read—all save Harriet: Harriet sewed. And the other girls thought Harriet very dull, and her mother was sure of it, and called her stupid and sometimes shook her and railed at her, endeavoring to arouse her out of her lethargy.

Harriet Martineau

Harriet has herself left on record somewhat of her feelings in those days. In her child heart there was a great aching void. Her life was wrong—the lives about her were wrong—she did not know how, and could not then trace the subject far enough to tell why. She was a-hungered, she longed for tenderness, for affection and the close confidence that knows no repulse. She wanted them all to throw down their sewing for just five minutes, and sit in the silence with folded hands. She longed for her mother to hold her on her lap so that she could pillow her head on her shoulder with her arms about her neck, and have a real good cry. Then all her troubles and pains would be gone.

But the slim little girl never voiced any of these foolish thoughts; she knew better. She choked back her tears and leaning over her sewing tried hard to be "good."

"She is so stupid that she never listens to what one reads to her," said the mother one day.

One of that family still lives. I saw him not long ago and talked with him face to face concerning some of the things here written—Doctor James Martineau, ninety two years old.

The others are all dead now—all are gone. In the cemetery at Norwich is a plain slate slab, "To the memory of Elizabeth Martineau, Mother of Harriet Martineau." . . . And so she sleeps, remembered for what? as the mother of a stupid little girl who tried hard to be good, but did n't succeed very well, and who did not listen when they read aloud.

IT seems sometimes that there is no such thing as a New Year—it is only the old year come back. These folks about us—have they not lived before? Surely they are the same creatures that have peopled earth in the days ago; they are busy about the same things, they chase after the same trifles, they commit the same mistakes, and blunder as men have always blundered.

Only last week a teacher in one of the primary schools of Chicago reported to her principal that a certain little boy in her room was so hopelessly dull and perverse that she despaired of teaching him anything. The child would sit with open mouth and look at her as she would talk to the class, and five minutes afterward he could not or would not repeat three words of what had been said. She had scolded him, made him stand on the floor, kept him in after school, and even whipped him, but all in vain. The principal looked into the case, scratched his head, stroked his whiskers, coughed, and decided that the public school funds should not be wasted in trying to "learn imbeciles," and so reported to the parents. He advised them to send the boy to a Home for the Feeble Minded, sending the message by an older brother. So the parents took the child to the Home and asked that he be admitted. The Matron took the little boy on her lap, talked to him, read to him, showed him pictures and said to the astonished parents, "This child has fully as much intelligence as any of your other children, perhaps more—but he is deaf."

Harriet Martineau

Harriet Martineau from her twelfth year was very deaf and she was also devoid of the senses of taste and of smell. "Oh, these are terrible tribulations to befall a mortal!" we exclaim with uplifted hands. But on sober second thought I am not sure that I know what is a tribulation and what a blessing. I'm not positive I would know a blessing should I see it coming up the street. For as I write it comes to me that the Great Big Black Things that have loomed against the horizon of my life, threatening to devour me, simply loomed and nothing more. They harmed me not. The things that have really made me miss my train have always been sweet, soft, pretty, pleasant things of which I was not in the least afraid.

Harriet Martineau

Mother Nature is kind, and if she deprives us of one thing she gives us another, and happiness seems to be meted out to each and all in equal portions. Harriet's afflictions caused her to turn her mind to other things than those which filled the hearts of girls her own age. Society chatter held nothing for her, she could not hear it if she would ; and she ate the food that agreed with her, not that which was merely pleasant to the taste. She began to live in a world of thought and ideas. The silence meant much.

“ The first requisite is that man should be a good animal.” I used to think that Herbert Spencer in voicing this aphorism struck twelve. But I am no longer enthusiastic about the remark. The senses of most dumb animals are far better developed than those of man. Hounds can trace footsteps over flat rocks, even though a shower has fallen in the interval ; cats can see in the dark ; rabbits hear sounds that men never hear ; horses detect an impurity in water that a chemical analysis does not reveal, and homing pigeons would gain nothing by carrying a compass. And so I feel safe in saying that if any man were so good and perfect an animal that he had the hound’s sense of smell, the cat’s eyesight, the rabbit’s sense of hearing, the horse’s sense of taste, and the homing pigeon’s “locality” he would not be one whit better prepared to appreciate Kipling’s “Dipsy Chanty,” and not a hair’s breadth nearer a point where he could write a poem to equal it.

No college professor can see so far as

a Sioux Indian, neither can he hear so well as a native African. There are rays of light that no unaided human eye can trace and there are sounds subtler than human ear can detect.

These five bodily faculties that we are pleased to call the senses were developed by savage man. He holds them in common with the brute. And now that man is becoming partially civilized he is in danger of losing them. Faculties not used are taken away. Dame Nature seems to consider that anything you do not utilize is not needed ; and as she is averse to carrying dead freight she drops it out.

But man can think, and the more he thinks and the further he projects his thought the less need he has for his physical senses. Homer's matchless vision was the rich possession of a blind man ; Milton never saw Paradise until he was sightless, and Helen Keller knows a world of things that were neither told her in lectures nor read from books. The far reaching intellect often goes with a singularly imperfect body, and these things seem to point the truth that the body is one thing and the soul another.

I make no argument for impoverished vitality, nor do I plead the cause of those who enjoy poor health. Yet how often do we find that the confessional of a family or a neighborhood is the bedside of one who sees the green fields only as did the Lady of Shalott by holding a looking-glass so that it reflects the out-of-doors. Let me carry that simile one step further and say that the mirror of the soul when kept free from fleck and stain reveals the beauties of the universe. And I am not sure but that the soul, freed from the distractions of sense and the trammels of flesh, glides away to a height where things are observed for the first time in their true proportions.

"The soul knows all things," says Emerson, and knowledge is only a remembering.

III.

THE Martineaus were Huguenots, a stern sturdy stock that suffered exile rather than forego the right of free thought and free speech. These are the people who are the salt of the earth. And yet as I read history I see that they are the people who have been hunted with dogs and followed by armed men carrying fagots. The driving of the Huguenots from France came near bankrupting the land, and the flight of Jews and Huguenots into England helped largely to make that country the counting-house of the world. Take the Quakers, Puritans, Huguenots, and other refugees from America and it is no longer the land of the free or the home of the brave.

Of the seven presidents who presided

over the deliberations of that first Continental Congress in Philadelphia, three were Huguenots: Henry Laurens, John Jay, and Elias Boudinot, and in the seats there were Puritans not a few.

“By God, Sir, we cannot afford to persecute the Quakers,” said a certain American a long while ago, “their religion may be wrong, but the people who cling to an idea are the only people we need. If we must persecute let us persecute the complacent.”

Harriet Martineau had all the restless independence of will that marked her ancestry. She set herself to acquire knowledge, and she did. When she was twenty she spoke three languages and could read in four. She knew history, astronomy, physical science, and it crowded her teacher in mathematics very hard to keep one lesson in advance of her. Besides, she could sew and cook and “keep house.” Yet it was all gathered by labor and toil and lift. By taking thought she had added cubits to her stature.

Harriet Martineau

But at twenty a great light suddenly shone around her. Love came and revealed the wonders of earth and heaven. She had ever been of a religious nature, but now her religion was vitalized and spiritualized. Deity was no longer a Being who dwelt at a great distance among the stars, but the Divine life was hers. It flowed through her, nourished her and gave her strength.

Renan suggests that one reason why religion remains on such a material plane for many is because they have never known a great and vitalizing love; a love where intellect, spirit, and sex finds its perfect mate. Love is the great enlightener. And in my own mind I am fully persuaded that comparatively few mortals ever experience this re-birth that a great love gives. We grope our way through life. Nature's first thought is for reproduction of the species; she has so overloaded physical passion that men and women marry when the blood is warm and intellect callow. Girls marry for life the first man that offers, and forever put behind them the possibilities of a love that would enable them to lift up their eyes to the hills from whence cometh their help. Very, very seldom do the years that bring a calmer pulse reveal a mating of mind and spirit.

When love came to Harriet she began to write, her first book being a little volume called Devotional Exercises. These daily musings on Divine things and these sweetly limpid prayers were all written out first for herself and her lover. But it came to her that what was a help to them might be a help to others. A publisher was found and the little work had a large sale and found appreciative readers for many years.

To-day, out under the trees, I read this first book written by Miss Martineau. How gently sweet and perfect are these prayers asking for a clean heart and a right spirit! And yet at this time Harriet Martineau had gotten well beyond the idea that God was a great big man who could be beseeched and moved to alter his plans because some creature on the planet Earth asked it. Her religion was pure Theism, with no confounding dogmas about who was to be saved and who damned. The state of infants who died unbaptized and of the heathen who passed away without ever having heard of Jesus did not trouble her. She already accepted the truth of necessity ; believing that every act of life was the result of a cause. We do what we do, and are what we are on account of impulses given us by previous training, previous acts or conditions under which we live and have lived.

If then everything in this world happens because something else happened a thousand years ago or yesterday, and the result could not possibly be different from what it is, why besiege Heaven with prayers ?

The answer is simple. Prayer is an emotional exercise ; an endeavor to bring the will into a state of harmony with the

Divine Will; a rest and a composure that gives strength by putting us in position to partake of the strength of the Universal. The man who prays to-day is as a result stronger to-morrow, and thus is prayer answered. By right thinking does the race grow. An act is only a crystallized thought; and this young girl's little book was designed as a help to right thinking. The things it taught are so simple that no man need go to a theological seminary to learn them: the Silence will tell him all if he will but listen and incline his heart.

Love had indeed made Harriet's spirit free. And to no woman can love mean so much as to one who is aware that she is physically deficient. Homely women are apt to make the better wives, and in all my earth-pilgrimage I never saw a more devoted love—a diviner tenderness than that which exists between a man of my acquaintance, sound in every sense and splendid in physique, and his wife who has been blind from her birth. For weeks after I first met this couple there rang in my ears that expression of Victor Hugo's, "To be blind and to be loved—what happier fate!"

But Harriet's lover was poor in purse and his family was likewise poor, and the thrifty Martineaus vigorously opposed the mating. In fact Harriet's mother hooted at it and spoke of it with scorn; and Harriet answered not back but hid her love away in her heart—biding the time when her lover should make for himself a name and a place and have money withal to command the respect of even mill owners.

So the days passed, and the months went by and three years counted themselves with the eternity that lies behind. Harriet's lover had indeed proved himself worthy. He had worked his way through college, had been graduated at the Divinity School, and his high reputation for character and his ability as a speaker won for him at once a position to which many older than he aspired.

Harriet Martineau

He became the pastor of the Unitarian Church at Manchester—and this was no small matter !

Now Norwich, where the Martineaus lived, is a long way from Manchester, where Harriet's lover preached, or it was then, in stage-coach times. It cost money, too, to send letters.

And there was quite an interval once when Harriet sent several letters, and anxiously looked for one ; but none arrived.

Then word came that the brilliant young preacher was ill ; he wished to see his betrothed. She started to go to him, but her parents opposed such an unprecedented thing. She hesitated, deferred her visit—intending soon to go at all hazards—hoping all the while to hear better news.

Word came that Harriet's lover was dead.

Soon after this the Martineau mills, through various foolish speculations, got into a bad way. Harriet's father found himself with more debts than he could pay ; his endeavors to buffet the storm broke his health—he gave up hope, languished, and died.

Mrs. Martineau and the family were thus suddenly deprived of all means of support. The boys were sent to work in the mills and the two older girls, having five sound senses each, found places where they could do housework and put money in their purses.

Harriet stayed at home and kept house. She also studied, read, and wrote a little—there was no other way !

IV.

SIX years passed and the name of Harriet Martineau was recognized as a power in the land. Her Illustrations of Political Economy had sold well up in the hundred thousands. The little stories were read by old and young, rich and poor, learned and unlearned. Sir Robert Peel had written Harriet a personal letter of encouragement ; Lord Brougham had paid for and given away a thousand copies of the booklets ; Richard Cobden had publicly endorsed them ; Coleridge had courted the author ; Florence Nightingale had sung her praises, and the Czar of Russia had ordered that "all the books of Harriet Martineau found in Russia shall be destroyed." Besides, she had incurred the wrath of King Philippe of France, who after first lavishly praising her and ordering the Illustrations translated into French, to be used in the public schools, suddenly discovered a hot chapter entitled "The Error called the Divine Right of Kings," and although Philippe was only a "citizen-king" he made haste to recall his kind words.

And I wish here to remark in parentheses, that the author who has not made warm friends and then lost them in an hour by writing things that did not agree with the preconceived idea of these friends, has either not written well or not been read. Every preacher who preaches ably has two doors to his church—one where the people come in and another through which he preaches them out. And I do not see how any man, even though he be divine, could expect or hope to have as many as twelve disciples and hold them for three years without being doubted, denied, and betrayed. If you have thoughts, and honestly speak your mind, Golgotha for you is not far away.

Harriet Martineau was essentially an agitator. She entered into life in its fullest sense, and no phase of existence escaped her keen and penetrating investigation. From writing books giving minute directions to housemaids to lengthy advice to prime ministers, her work never lagged. She was widely read, beloved, respected, feared, and well hated.

When her political economy tales were selling their best the Government sent her word that on application she could have a pension of two hundred pounds a year for life. A pension of this kind comes nominally as a reward for excellent work or heroic service. But a pension may mean something else: it often implies that the receiver shall not offend nor affront the one that bestows it. Could we trace the true inner history of pensions granted by monarchies we would find that they are usually diplomatic moves.

Harriet made no response to the generous offer of a life-long maintenance from the State, but continued to work away after her own methods. Yet the offer of a pension did her good in one way ; it suggested the wisdom of setting aside a sum that would support her when her earning powers were diminished. From her two books written concerning her trip to America she received the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars. With this she purchased an insurance policy in the form of a deferred annuity, providing that from her fiftieth year to her death she should receive the annual sum of five hundred dollars. Now where in all the realm of Grub Street do we find a man who set this example of cool wisdom for this crippled woman? At this time she was supporting her mother who had become blind, and also a brother who was a slave to drink.

Harriet Martineau

Twenty-five years after the first offer of pension the Government renewed the proposition. But Harriet explained that her needs were few and her wants simple; that she had enough anyway, and besides, she could not consent to the policy of pensioning one class of persons for well-doing and forgetting all the toilers who have worked just as conscientiously, but along lowly lines; if she ever did need aid she would do as other old women were obliged to do, i. e., apply to the parish.

Barriet Martineau

I find that Miss Martineau records that she wrote for the Daily London News alone, sixteen hundred and forty-two separate editorials. She also wrote over two hundred magazine articles, and published upwards of fifty books. Her work was not classic, for it was written for the times. That her influence for good on the thought of the times was wide and far-reaching all thoughtful men agree. And he who influences the thought of his times, influences all the times that follow. He has made his impress on eternity.

OPINIONS may differ as to what constitutes Harriet Martineau's best work, but my view is that her translation and condensation of Auguste Comte's six volumes into two will live when all of her other work is forgotten. Comte's own writings were filled with many repetitions and rhetorical flounderings. He was more of a philosopher than a writer. He had an idea too big for him to express, but he expressed it right bravely. Miss Martineau, trained writer and thinker, did not translate verbally: she caught the idea, and translated the thought rather than the language. And so it has come about that her work has been translated literally back into French and is accepted as a text-book of Positivism, while the original books of the philosopher are merely collected by museums and bibliophiles as curiosities.

Comte taught that man passes through three distinct mental stages in his development. First, man attributes all phenomena to a "Personal God," and to this God he servilely prays. Second, he believes in a "Supreme Essence," a "Universal Principle" or a "First Cause," and seeks to discover its hiding-place. Third, he ceases to hunt out the unknowable, and is content to live and work for a positive present good, fully believing that what is best to-day cannot fail to bring the best results to-morrow.

Harriet had long considered that one reason for the very slow advancement of civilization was that men had ever busied themselves with supernatural concerns, and in fearsome endeavors to make themselves secure for another world had neglected this. Man had tried to make peace with the skies instead of peace with his neighbor. She also thought she saw clearly that right living was one thing, and a belief in theological dogma another. That these things sometimes go together she of course admitted, but a belief in a "vicarious atonement" and a "miraculous conception" she did not believe made a man a gentler husband, a better neighbor, or a more patriotic citizen. Man does what he does because he thinks at the moment it is the best thing to do. And if you could make men believe that peace, truth, honesty, and industry were the best standards to adopt—bringing the best results—all men would adopt them. There are no such things as reward and punishment, as these terms are ordinarily used, there are only good results and bad results. We sow, and reap what we have sown.

Miss Martineau had long believed these things, but Comte proved them—proved them in six ponderous tomes—and she set herself the task to simplify his philosophy.

There is one point of attraction that

Comte's thought had for Harriet Martineau that I have never seen mentioned in print—that is, his mental attitude on the value of love in a well-ordered life.

In the springtime of his manhood, Auguste Comte, sensitive, confiding, generous, loved a beautiful girl. She did not share his intellectual ambitions, his divine aspiration: she was only a beautiful animal. Man proposes but is not always accepted. She married another and Comte was disconsolate—for a day.

He pondered the subject, read the lives of various great men, talked with monks and sundry friars grey, and after five years wrote out at length the reasons why a man in order to accomplish a far-reaching and splendid work, must live the life of a celibate. "To achieve," said Comte, "you must be married to your work."

Comte lived for some time content in this philosophy, constantly strengthening it and buttressing it against attack; for we believe a thing first and skirmish for our proof afterward. But when past forty, and his hair was turning to silver and crow's-feet were showing themselves in his fine face, and when there was a halt in his step and his laughter had died away into a weary smile, he met a woman whose nature was as finely sensitive and as silkenly strong as his own. She had intellect, aspiration, power. She was gentle, and a womanly woman, withal; his best mood was matched by hers, she sympathized with his highest ideal.

They loved and they married.

The crow's-feet disappeared from Comte's face, the halt in his step was gone, the laugh returned, and people said that the silver in his hair was becoming.

Shortly after, Comte set himself to work overhauling all of the foolish things he had said about the necessity of celibacy. He declared that a man without his mate only stumbled his way through life. There was the male man and the female man, and only by working together could these two souls hope to progress. It requires two to generate thought. Comte felt sure that he was writing the final word. He avowed that there was no more to say. He declared that should his wife go hence the fountains of his soul would dry up; his mind would famish, and the light of his life would go out in darkness.

The gods were envious of such love as this.

Comte's mate passed away.

He was stricken dumb; the calamity was too great for speech or tears.

But five years after, he got down his books and went over his manuscripts and again revised his philosophy of what constitutes the true condition for the highest and purest thought. To have known a great and exalted love and have it fade from your grasp and flee as shadow, living only in memory, is the highest good, he wrote. A great sorrow at one stroke, purchases a redemption from all petty troubles, it sinks all trivial annoyances into nothingness and grants the man life-long freedom from all petty, corroding cares. His feelings have been sounded to their depths—the plummet has touched bottom. Fate has done her worst: she has brought him face to face with the Supreme Calamity, and thereafter there is nothing can inspire terror.

The memory of a great love can never die from out the heart. It affords a ballast 'gainst all the storms that blow. And although it lends an unutterable sadness, it imparts an unspeakable peace.

A great love, even when fully possessed, affords no complete gratification. There is an essence in it that eludes all ownership. Its highest use seems to be a purifying impulse for nobler endeavor. It says at the last, "Arise, and get thee hence for this is not thy rest."

Where there is this haunting memory of a great love lost there is always forgiveness, charity, and a sympathy that makes the man brother to all who endure and suffer. The individual himself is nothing ; he has nothing to hope for, nothing to gain, nothing to win, nothing to lose ; for the first time and the last he has a selflessness that is wide as the world and wherein there is no room for the recollection of a wrong. In this memory of a great love there is a nourishing source of strength by which the possessor lives and works ; he is in communication with elemental conditions.

Harriet Martineau

Harriet Martineau was a life-long widow of the heart. That first great passion of her early womanhood, the love that was lost, remained with her all the days of her life : springing fresh every morning, her last thought as she closed her eyes at night. Other loves came to her, attachments varying in nature and degree, but in this supreme love all was fused and absorbed.

In this love you get the secret of power.

A great love is a pain, yet it is a benison and a benediction. If we carry any possession from this world to another it is the memory of a great love. For even in the last hour, when the coldness of death shall creep into the stiffening limbs, and the brain shall be stunned and the thoughts stifled, there shall come to the tongue a name, a name not mentioned aloud for years—there shall come a name ; and as the last flickering rays of life flare up to go out on earth forever, the tongue will speak this name that was long, long ago burned into the soul by the passion of a love that fadeth not away.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

I was not surprised when I went down into the hall to see that a brilliant June morning had succeeded to the tempest of the night, and to feel through the open glass door the breathing of a fresh and fragrant breeze. Nature must be glad-some when I was so happy. A beggar woman and her little boy, pale, ragged objects both, were coming up the walk, and I ran down and gave them all the money I happened to have in my purse—some three or four shillings: good or bad they must partake of my jubilee. The rooks cawed and blither birds sung, but nothing was so merry or so musical as my own rejoicing heart.

RUMOR has it that there be Americans who are never happy unless passing for Englishmen. And I think I have discovered a like anomaly on the part of the sons of Ireland—a wish to pass for Frenchmen. On Continental hotel registers the good honest name of O'Brian often turns queer somersaults, and more than once in "The States" does the kingly prefix of O evolve itself into Van or De, which perhaps is quite proper seeing they all mean the same thing. One cause of this tendency may lie in the fact that St. Patrick was a native of France; although St. Patrick may or may not have been chosen patron saint on account of his nationality. But the patron saint of Ireland being a Frenchman, what more natural, and therefore what more proper, than that the whole Emerald Isle should slant toward the people who love art and rabbit stew! Anyway, from the proud patronymic of Patricius to plain Pat is quite a drop, and my heart is with Paddy in his efforts to get back.

When Patrick Prunty of County Down, Ireland, shook off the shackles of environment, and mud of the peat bog, and went across to England, presenting himself at the gates of St. John's College, Cambridge, asking for admittance, I am glad he handed in his name as Mr. P. Brontë, accent on the last syllable.

There is a gentle myth abroad that preachers are "called," while other men adopt a profession or get a job, but no Protestant Episcopal clergyman I have ever known, and I have known many, ever made any such claim. They take up the profession because it supplies honors and a "living." Then they can do good too, and all men want to do good. So they hie them to a divinity school and are taught the mysteries of theological tierce and thrust; and interviewing a clerical tailor they are ready to accept the honors and partake of the living. After a careful study of the life of Patrick Brontë I cannot find that his ambition extended beyond the desirable things I have named, that is to say inclusively, honors and a living.

He was tall, athletic, dark, and surely a fellow of force and ambition to set his back on the old and boldly rap for admittance at the gates of Cambridge. He was a pretty good student too, although a bit quarrelsome and sometimes mischievous—throwing his force into quite unnecessary ways, as Irishmen are apt to do. He fell in love, of course, and has not an Irishman in love been likened to Vesuvius in state of eruption? We know of at least one charming girl who refused to marry him because he declined, unlike Othello, to tell the story of his life. And it was assumed that any man who would not tell who "his folks" were, was a rogue and a varlet and a vagrom at heart. And all the while Monsieur Brontë had nothing worse to conceal than that he was from County Down and his name Prunty. He would n't give in and tell the story of his life to slow music and so the girl wept and then stormed, and finally Brontë stormed and went away, and the girl and her parents were sure that the Frenchman was a murderer escaping justice. Fortunate, aye, thrice fortunate is it for the world that neither Brontë nor the girl wavered even in the estimation of a hair.

Brontë got through school and came out with tuppence worth of honors. When thirty we find him established as curate at the shabby little town of Hartshead, in Yorkshire. Little Miss Brauwel, from Penzance, came up there on a visit to her uncle, and the Reverend

Brontë at once fell violently in love with her dainty form and gentle ways. I say "violently" for that 's the kind of a man Brontë was. Darwin says: "The faculty of amativeness is not aroused excepting by the unfamiliar." Girls who go away visiting, wearing their best bib and tucker, find lovers without fail. One third of all marriages in the United States occur in just this way: the bib and tucker being sprung on the young man as a surprise, dazzles and hypnotizes him into an avowal and an engagement.

And so they were married—were Rev. Patrick Brontë and Miss Maria Branwell. He was big, bold, and dictatorial: she was little, shy, and sensitive. The babies came—one in less than a year, then a year apart. The dainty little woman had her troubles, we are sure of that. Her voice comes to us only as a plaintive echo. When she asked to have the bread passed she always apologized. Once her aunt sent her a present of a pretty silk dress, for country clergymen's wives do not have many luxuries, don't you know that? and Patrick Brontë cut the dress into strips before her eyes and then threw the pieces, and the little slippers to match, into the fireplace, to teach his wife humility. He used to practise with a pistol and shoot in the house to steady the lady's nerves, and occasionally he got plain drunk. A man like Brontë in a little town with a tired little wife, and with inferior people, is a despot. He busies himself with trifles, looks after foolish details and the neighbors let him have his own way and his wife has to, and the result is that he becomes convinced in his own mind that he is the people and wisdom will die with him.

And yet Brontë wrote some pretty good poetry and had faculties that rightly developed might have made him an excellent man. He should have gone down to London (or up, because it is South) and there come into competition with men as strong as himself. Fate should have seized him by the hair and bumped his head against stone walls and cuffed him thoroughly and kicked him into line, teaching him humility, then out of the scrimmage we might have gotten a really superior product.

Mrs. Brontë became a confirmed invalid. A man cannot always badger a woman; God is good—she dies. Little Marja Branwell had been married eight years; when she passed out she left six children, “all of a size,” a neighbor woman has written. Over her grave is a tablet erected by her husband informing the wayfarer that “she has gone to meet her Saviour.” At the bottom is this warning to all women: “Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh.”

Five of these motherless children were girls and one a boy. As you stand there in that stone church at Haworth reading the inscription above Maria Branwell's grave you can also read the death record of the babes she left. The mother died September 15, 1821; her oldest daughter

Charlotte Brontë

Maria, May 6, 1825; Elizabeth, June 15, 1825; Patrick Branwell, September 24, 1848; Emily, Dec. 19, 1848; Anne, May 28, 1849; Charlotte, March 31, 1855.

Those whom the gods love die young :
the Rev. Patrick Brontë lived to be eighty-five.

II.

I GOT out of the train at Keighley, which you must pronounce "Keethley," and leaving my valise with the station master started on foot for Haworth, four miles away. Keighley is a manufacturing town where various old mansions have been turned into factories and where new factories have sprung up, square, spick-span trimmed stone buildings, with fire-escapes and red tanks on top.

One of these old mansions I saw had a fine copper roof that shone in the sun like a monster Lake Superior agate. It stands a bit back from the road, and on one great gate post is a brass plate reading "Cardigan Hall" and on the other a sign "No admittance—apply at the Office." So I applied at the office, which is evidently the ancient lodge, and asked if Mr. Cardigan was in. Four clerks perched on high stools, crouching over big ledgers, dropped their pens and turning on their spiral seats looked at me with staring eyes, and with mouths wide open. I repeated the question and one of the quartette, a wheezy little old man in spectacles and whiskers on his neck, clambered down from his elevated position and ambled over near, walking around me, eying me curiously.

“Go wan wi’ yer wurruk, ye idlers!” he suddenly commanded the others. And then he explained to me that Mr. Cardigan was not in, neither was Mr. Jackson. In fact Mr. Cardigan had not been in for a hundred years—being dead. But if I wanted to look at goods I could be accommodated with bargains fully five per cent below Lunnon market. The little old man was in such serious earnest that I felt it would be a sin to continue a joke. I explained that I was only a tourist in search of the picturesque, and thereby did I drop ten points in the old man’s estimation. But this did I learn, that Lord Cardigan has won deathless fame by attaching his name to a knit jacket, just as the name Jaeger will go clattering down the corridors of time attached to a "combination suit."

This splendid old mansion was once the ancestral home of a branch of the noble family of Cardigan. But things got somewhat shuffled, through too many hot suppers up to London (being South), and stacks of reds and stacks of blues were drawn in towards the dealer, and so the old mansion fell under the hammer of the auctioneer. What an all-powerful thing is an auctioneer's hammer! And now from the great parlors, and the library, and the "hall" and the guest-chambers echo the rattle of spinning jennys and the dull booming of whirling pulleys. And above the song of whirring wheels came the songs of girls at their work ; voices that alone might have been harsh and discordant, but blending with the monotone of the factory's roar were really melodious.

“We cawn’t keep the nasty thing from singin’,” said the old man apologetically.

“Why should you?” I asked.

“Huh, mon! but they sing sacred songs, and chaunts, and a’ that, and say all together from twenty rooms, a hundred times a day, ‘Aws ut wuz in th’ be-ginnin’, uz now awn ever shawl be, worl’ wi’out end, Aamen.’ It’s not right. I’ve told Mr. Jackson. Listen now, did n’t I tell ye?”

“Then you are a Churchman?”

And the old man wiped his glasses and told me that he was a Churchman, although an unworthy one, and had been for fifty-four years, come Michaelmas. Yes, he had always lived here, was born only across the beck away—his father was game-keeper for Lord Cardigan, and afterwards agent. He had been to Haworth many times, although not for ten years. He knew the Rev. Patrick Brontë well, for the Incumbent from Haworth used to preach at Keighley once a year, and sometimes twice. Brontë was a fine man with a splendid voice for intoning ; and very strict about keeping out all heresies and such. He had a lot of trouble, had Brontë : his wife died and left him eight or ten children, all smart, but rather wild. They gave him a lot of bother, especially the boy. One of the girls married Mr. Brontë's curate, Mr. Nicholls, a very decent kind of man who comes to Keighley once a year, and always comes to the factory to ask how things are going.

Yes, Mr. Nicholls' first wife died years and years ago. She used to write things—novels ; but no one should read novels ; novels are stories that are not so—things that never happened ; they tell of folks that never was.

Having no argument to present in way of rebuttal, I shook hands with the old man and started away. He walked with me to the road to put me on the right way to Haworth. Looking back as I reached the corner, I saw four “ clarks ”

Charlotte Brontë

watching me intently from the office windows, and from above the roar and jangle of machinery was borne on the summer breeze the sound of sacred song—shrill feminine voices :

“Awn ut wuz in th’ beginnin’, uz now awn ever shawl be, worl’ wi’out end—Aamen !”

III.

AS one moves out of Keighley the country becomes stony ; the trees are left behind, and there rise on all sides billow on billow of purple heather. The way is rough as the Pilgrim's Progress road to Paradise. These hillside moors are filled with springs that high up form rills, then brooks, then cascades or "becks," and along the Haworth road, wherever one of these hurrying, scurrying, dancing becks crosses the highway, there is a factory devoted to keeping alive the name of Cardigan. Next to the factory is a "pub.," and publicans and factories checker themselves all along the route. Mixed in with these are long rows of tenement houses well built of stone, and slate roofs, but with a grimy air of desolation about them that surely drives their occupants to drink. To have a home a man must build it himself. Forty houses in a row, all alike, are not homes at all.

I believe an observant man once wrote of the hand being subdued to what it works in. The man who wrote that surely never tramped along the Haworth road as the bell rang for twelve o'clock. From out the factories poured a motley mob of men, women, and children, not only with hands dyed, but clothing, faces, and heads as well. Girls with bright green hair, and lemon-colored faces, leered and jeered at me as they hastened pell-mell with hats askew, and stockings down, and dragging shawls, for home or public house. Red and maroon children ran, and bright scarlet men smoked stolidly, taking their time with genuine grim Yorkshire sullen sourness.

“How far is it to Haworth?” I asked one such specimen.

he jerked his thumb over his shoulder toward a gin-shop near by.

“Very well,” said I, “I ’ll buy you a double pot of ’arf and ’arf, this time.”

The man seemed a bit surprised but no smile came over his spattered rainbow face as he led the way into the drink-shop. The place was crowded with men and women scrambling for penny sandwiches and drinks fermented and spiritous. Some of these women had babies at their breasts, the babies being brought by appointment by older children who stayed at home while the mothers worked. And as the mothers gulped their triple XXX, and swallowed hunks of black bread, the little innocents dined. The mothers were rather kindly disposed, though, and occasionally allowed the youngsters to take sips out of their foaming glasses, or at least to drain them. Suddenly a woman with purple hair spied me out and called in falsetto :

“Ah, Sawndy McClure has caught a

gen'l'mon. Why did n't I see 'im fust an' 'arve 'im fer a pet?"

There was a guffaw at my expense and 'arf and 'arf as well, for all the party, or else quarrel. As it was, my stout stick probably saved me from the "personal touch." I stayed until the factory bells rang, and out my new-found friends scurried for fear of being the fatal five minutes late and getting locked out. Some of them shook my hand as they went and others pounded me on the back for luck, and several of the girls got my tag and shouted "You 're it!"

I used to think that Yorkshire folks were hopelessly dull and sublimely stupid; quarrelsome withal and pigheaded to the thirty-second degree, but I have partially come to the conclusion that their glum ways often conceal a peculiar kind of grim humor and beneath the tough husk is considerable good nature.

The absence of large trees make it possible to see the village of Haworth several miles away. It seems to cling to the stony hillside as if it feared being blown into space. There is a hurrying, rushing rill here, too, that turns a little woollen mill. Then there is a "Black Bull" tavern, with a stable yard at the side and rows of houses on the one street, all very straight up and down. One misses the climbing roses of ideal merry England, and the soft turf and spreading yews and the flowering hedge-rows where throstles and linnets play hide-and-seek the live-long day. It is all cold grey stone, lichen covered, and the houses do not invite you to enter and the gardens bid no welcome, and only the great purple wastes of moorland greet you as a friend and brother.

Outside the Black Bull sits a solitary hostler who feels it would be a weakness to show any good humor. So he bottles his curiosity and scowls from under red bushy eyebrows.

Turning off the main street is a narrow road leading to the church—square and grey and cold. Next to it is the parsonage, built of the same material, and beyond is the crowded city of the dead.

I plied the knocker at the parsonage door and asked for the rector. He was away at Kendal to attend a funeral, but his wife was at home—a pleasant matronly woman of near sixty with smooth white hair. She came to the door knitting furiously but from her regulation smile I saw that visitors were not uncommon.

“You want to see the home of the Brontës. That’s right, come right in. This was the study of the Rev. Patrick Brontë, Incumbent of this Parish for fifty years.” . . .

She sang her little song and knitted and shifted the needles and measured the foot, for the stocking was nearly done. It was a blue stocking (although she was n’t) with a white toe; and all the time she led me from room to room telling me about the Brontës—how there was the father, mother, and six children. They all came together. The mother died shortly and then two of the little girls died. That left three girls and Branwell the boy. He was petted and made too much of by his father and everybody. He was the one that always was going to do great things. He made the girls wait on him and cuffed them if they did n't, and if they did, and all the time told of the things he was going to do. But he never did them, for he spent most of his time at the taverns. After a while he died—died of the tremens.

The three Brontë girls, Emily, Charlotte, and Annie, wrote a novel apiece, and never showed them to their father or any one. They called 'emselves Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell, and their novels were the greatest ever written—they wrote them 'emselves with no man to help. Their father was awful mad about it, but when the money began to come in he felt better. Emily died when she was twenty-seven. She was the brightest of them all; then Annie died and only Charlotte and the old man were left. Charlotte married her father's curate, but old Mr. Brontë would n't go to the wedding : he went to the Black Bull instead. Miss Wooler gave the bride away—some one had to give her away, you know. The bride was thirty-eight. She died in less than a year, and old Mr. Brontë and Charlotte's husband lived here alone together.

This was Charlotte's room, this is the desk where she wrote Jane Eyre—leastwise they say it is. This is the chair she sat in, and under that framed glass are several sheets of her manuscript. The writing is almost too small to read ; and so fine and yet so perfect and neat ! She was a wonderful tidy body, very small and delicate and gentle, yet with a good deal of her father's energy.

Here are letters she wrote : you can look at them if you choose. This footstool she made and covered herself. It is filled with heather blossoms—just as she left it. Those books were hers too—many of them given to her by great authors. See, there is Thackeray's name written by himself and a letter from him pasted inside the front cover. He was a big man they say but he wrote very small, and Charlotte wrote just like him, only better, and now there are hundreds of folks write like 'em both. Then here 's a book with Miss Martineau's name, and another from Robert Browning—do you know who he was?

Yes, the church is always open. Go in and stay as long as you choose ; at the door is a poor box and if you wish to put something in you can do so—a sixpence most visitors put in, or a shilling if you insist on it. You know we are not a rich parish—the wool all goes to Manchester now and the factory hands are on half pay and times are scarce. You will come again sometime, come when the heather is in bloom, won't you? That's right. Oh, stay! the boxwood there in the garden was planted by Charlotte's own hands—perhaps you would like a sprig of it—there, I thought you would !

IV.

ALL who write concerning the Brontës dwell on the sadness and the tragedy of their lives. They picture Charlotte's earth-journey as one devoid of happiness, lacking all that sweetens and makes for satisfaction. They forget that she wrote Jane Eyre and that no person utterly miserable ever did a great work, and I assume that they know not of the wild, splendid, intoxicating joy that follows a performance well done. To be sure Jane Eyre is a tragedy, but the author of a tragedy must be greater than the plot—greater than his puppets. He is their creator and his life runs through and pervades theirs just as the life of our Creator flows through us. In Him we live and move and have our being. And I submit that the writer of a tragedy is not cast down or undone at the time he pictures his heroic situations and conjures forth his strutting spirits. When the play ends and the curtain falls on the fifth act there is still one man alive and that is the author. He may be gorged with crime and surfeited with blood but there is a surging exultation in his veins as he views the ruin that his brain has wrought.

Charlotte loved the great stretch of purple moors, hill on hill fading away into eternal mist. And the wild winds that sighed and moaned at casements or raged in sullen wrath, tugging at the roof, were her friends. She loved them all and thought of them as visiting spirits. They were her properties, and no writer who ever lived has made such splendid use of winds and storm-clouds and driving rain as did Charlotte Brontë. People who point to the chasing angry clouds and the swish of dripping rose bushes blown against the cottage windows as proof of Charlotte Brontë's chronic depression know not the eager joy of a storm walk. And I am sure they never did as one I know did last night : saddle a horse at ten o'clock and gallop away into the darkness ; splash, splash in the sighing, moaning, bellowing, driving November rain. There 's joy for you ! ye who toast your feet on the fender and cultivate sick headache around the base burner—there 's a life that ye never guess !

But Charlotte knew the clouds by night and the swift-sailing moon that gave just one peep out and disappeared. She knew the rifts where the stars shone through, and out alone in the breeze that blew away her cares she lifted her voice in thankfulness for the joy of mixing with the elements, and that her spirit was one with the boisterous winds of heaven.

People who live in beautiful quiet valleys, where roses bloom all the year through are not necessarily happy. Southern California—the Garden of Eden of the world—evolves just as many cases per capita of melancholia as bleak, barren Maine. Wild, rocky, forbidding Scotland has produced more genius to the acre than beautiful England: and I have found that sailor Jack, facing the North Atlantic winter storms, year after year, is a deal jollier companion than the Florida cracker whose chief adversary is mosquitos.

Charlotte Brontë wrote three great books, Jane Eyre, Shirley, and Villette. From the lonely, bleak parsonage on that stony hillside she sent forth her swaying filament of thought and lassoed the world. She lived to know that she had won. Money came to her, all she needed, honors, friends, and lavish praise. She was the foremost woman author of her day. Her name was on every tongue. She had met the world in fair fight; without patrons, paid advocates, or influential friends she made her way to the very front. Her genius was acknowledged. She accomplished all that she set out to do and more—far more. The great, the learned, the titled, the proud; all those who reverence the tender heart and far-reaching mind acknowledged her as queen.

Charlotte Brontë

So why prate of her sorrows! did she not work them up into art? Why weep over her troubles when these were the weapons with which she won? Why sit in sackcloth on account of her early death when it is appointed of all men once to die, and with her the grave was swallowed up in victory!

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

My life is but a working day,
Whose tasks are set aright :
A while to work, a while to pray,
And then a quiet night.
And then, please God, a quiet night
Where Saints and Angels walk in white .
One dreamless sleep from work and sorrow,
But re-awakening on the morrow.

In Patience.

AS a study in heredity, the Rossetti family is most interesting. Genius seems so sporadic a stuff that when we find an outcrop along the line of a whole family we are wont to mark it on memory's chart in red. We talk of the Herschels, of Renan and his sister, of the Beechers, and the Fields, in a sort of awe, mindful that Nature is parsimonious in giving out transcendent talent and may never do the like again. So who can forget the Rossettis—two brothers, Dante Gabriel and William Michael—and two sisters, Maria and Christina—each of whom stands forth as far above the ordinary, yet all strangely dependent on one another?

The girls sing songs to the brothers, and to each other, inscribing poems to "my loving sister"; when Dante Gabriel, budding forth as artist, wishes a model for a Madonna, he chooses his sister Christina, and in his sketch mantles the plain features with a divine gentleness and heavenly splendor such as only the loving heart can conjure forth. In the last illness of Maria, Christina watches away the long, lagging hours of night, almost striving with her brothers for the right of serving; and at Birchington-on-the-Sea, Dante Gabriel waits for death, wearing out his friends by insane suspicions, and only the sister seems equal to ministering to this mind diseased, plucking from memory its rooted sorrow.

In a few years Christina passes out and of the four, only William is left; and the task of his remaining years is to put properly before the world the deathless lives of his brother and sisters gone.

Gabriel Rossetti, father of the illustrious four, was an Italian poet who wrote patriotic hymns, and wrote them so well that he was asked to sing them elsewhere than in Italy. This edict of banishment was followed by an order that the poet be arrested and executed. The orders of banishment and execution appear quite Milesian viewed across the years, but to Rossetti it was no joke. To keep his head in its proper place and to preserve his soul alive he departed one dark night for England. He arrived penniless, with no luggage save his lyre, but with muse intact. Yet it was an Italian lyre, and therefore of small avail for amusing Britons. Very naturally Rossetti made the acquaintance of other refugees, and exile makes fast friends. It is only in prosperity that we throw our friends overboard.

He came to know the Polidori family—Tuscan refugees—proud, intellectual, and rich. He loved one of the daughters of Seignior Polidori, and she loved him. He was forty and she was twenty-three—but what of that! A position as Professor of Languages was secured for him in King's College. He rented the house No. 38 Charlotte Street, off Portland Place, and there, on February 17, 1827, was born their first child, Maria Francesca; on May 12, 1828, was born Dante Gabriel; on September 25, 1829, William Michael; on December 5, 1830, Christina Georgiana. The mother of this quartette was a sturdy little woman with a sparkling wit and rare good sense. She used to remark that her children were all of a size, and that it was no more trouble to bring up four than one, a suggestion thrown in here gratis for the benefit of young married folks in the hope that they will mark and inwardly digest. In point of well-ballasted, all 'round character, fit for earth or heaven, none of the four Rossetti children was equal to his parents. They all seem to have had nerves outside of their clothes. Perhaps this was because they were brought up in London. A city is no place for children—nor grown people either, I often think. Birds and children belong in the country. Paved streets, stone sidewalks, smoke-begrimed houses, signs reading “Keep off the grass,” prying policemen, and zealous ash-box inspectors are insulting things to greet the gaze of the little immigrants fresh from God. Small wonder is it, as they grow up, that they take to drink and drugs, seeking in these a respite from the rattle of wheels and the never-ending cramp of unkind condition. But Nature understands herself: the second generation, city-bred, is impotent.

No pilgrim from “the States” should visit the city of London without carrying two books: a Baedeker’s London and Hutton’s Literary Landmarks. The chief advantage of the former is that it is bound in flaming red, and carried in the hand advertises the owner as an American, thus saving all formal introductions. In the rustle, bustle, and tussle of Fleet

Street, I have held up my book to a party of Americans on the opposite sidewalk, as a ship runs up her colors, and they seeing the sign, in turn held up theirs in merry greeting; and we passed on our way without a word, ships that pass in the afternoon and greet each other in passing. Now I have no desire to rival the flamboyant Baedeker, nor to eclipse my good friend Mr. Laurence Hutton. But as I cannot find that either mentions the name "Rossetti" I am going to set down (not in malice) the places in London that are closely connected with the Rossetti family, nothing extenuating.

London is the finest city in the world for the tourist who desires liberty as wide as the wind, and who wishes to live cheaply and live well. In New York, if you want lodgings at a moderate price, you must throttle your pride and forsake respectability; but they do things differently in Lunnion, you know. From Gray's Inn Road to Portland Place, and from Oxford Street to Euston Road, there is just about a square mile—a section, as they say out West—of lodging-houses. Once this part of London was given up to the homes of the great and purse-proud and all that. It is respectable yet, and if you are going to be in London a week you can get a good room in one of these old-time mansions, and pay no more for it than you would pay for a room in an American hotel for one day. And as for meals, your landlady will get you anything you want and serve it for you in the daintiest style, and you will also find that a shilling and a little courtesy will go a very long way in securing creature comforts. American women in London can live in this way just as well as men. If you are a school ma'am from Peoria, taking your vacation, follow my advice and make your home in the "Bedford District," within easy reach of Stopford Brooke's chapel, and your London visit will stand out forever as a bright oasis in memory's desert waste. All of which I put in here because Larry Hutton forgot to mention it and Mein Herr Baedeker did n't think it worth while.

When in London I usually get a room near the British Museum for ten shillings a week ; and when I want to go anywhere I walk up to the Gower Street Station, past the house where the mother of Charles Dickens had her Young Ladies' Establishment, and buying a ticket at the "Booking-Office" am duly set down near the desired objective point. You can go anywhere by the "Metropolitan," or if you prefer to take Mr. Gladstone's advice, you climb to the top of an Oxford Street bus, and if you sit next the driver you have a directory, guide, and familiar friend all at your service.

Charlotte Street is a narrow little passage running just two squares, parallel with Portland Place. The houses are built in blocks of five (or more), of the plainest of plain bricks. The location is not far from the Gower Street Station of the Metropolitan Railway, and only a few minutes' walk from the British Museum. Number 38 is the last but one on the east side of the street. When I first saw it there was a sign in the window, "Apartments," and back of this fresh cambric curtains. Then the window had been cleaned, too, for a single day of neglect in London tells its tale, as does the record of crime on a rogue's face. I paused and looked the place over with interest. I noted that the brass plate with the "No. 38" on it had been polished until it had been nearly polished out of sight, like a machine-made sonnet too much gone over. The steps had been freshly sanded, and a little lemon-tree nodding in one of the windows made the rusty old house look quite inviting. A stout little woman, with a big market-basket, bumped into me and apologized. It was I who should have apologized, for I had stepped backwards to get a better look at the upstairs windows. The stout little woman set down her basket on the steps, took a bunch of keys from a pocket under her big white starched apron, selected one, turned to me, smiled, and asked: "Mebbe, Sir, you was n't looking for apartments, I dunno?" Then she explained that the house was hers, and that if I would step in she would show me the rooms. There were two of 'em she could spare. The first floor front was already let, and so was the front parlor—to a young barrister. Her husband was a ticket taker at Euston Station, and did n't get much since last cut-down. Would I care to pay as much as ten shillings, and would I want breakfast? It would only be ninepence, and I could have either a chop or ham and eggs. She looked after her boarders herself, just as if they were her own folks, and only took respectable single gentlemen who came well recommended. She knew I would like the room, and if ten shillings was too much I could have the back room for seven and six.

I thought the back room would answer; but explained that I was an American and was going to remain in London only a short time. Of course the lady knew I was an American, she knew it from my hat and from my foreign accent and—from the red book I had in my hand. And did I know the McIntyres that lived in Michigan?

I evaded the question by asking if she knew the Rossettis who once lived in this house. "Oh, yes, I know Mr. William and Miss Christina. They came here together a year ago, and told me they were born here and that their brother Dante and their sister too were born here. I think they were all writin' folks, were n't they? Miss Rossetti anyway writes poetry, I know that. One of my boarders gave me one of her books for Christmas. I'll show it to you. You don't think seven and six is too much for a room like that, do you?"

I inwardly noted that the ceilings were much lower than those of my room in Russell Square and that the furniture was old and worn and that the room looked out on an army of sooty chimney pots, but I explained that seven and six seemed a very reasonable price, and that nine pence for breakfast with ham and eggs was cheap enough, provided the eggs were strictly fresh.

So I paid one week's rent in advance on the spot, and going back to Russell Square told my landlady that I had found friends in another part of the city and would not return for two days. My sojourn at No. 38 Charlotte Street developed nothing further than the meagre satisfaction of sleeping for two nights in the room in which Dante Gabriel Rossetti was born, and making the acquaintance of the worthy ticket taker who knew all four of the Rossettis, as they had often passed through his gate.

Professor Rossetti lived for twelve years at No. 38 Charlotte Street ; he then moved to No. 50 in the next block, which is a somewhat larger house. It was here that Mazzini used to come. The house has been made over somewhat and is now used as an office by the Registrar of Vital Statistics. This is the place where Dante Gabriel and a young man named Holman Hunt had a studio, and where another young artist by the name of William Morris came to visit them ; and here was born The Germ, that queer little chipmunk magazine in which first appeared Hand and Soul and The Blessed Damozel, written by Dante Gabriel when eighteen, the same age at which Bryant wrote Thanatopsis. William Bell Scott used to come here too. Scott was a great man in his day. He had no hair on his head or face, not even eyebrows. Every follicle had grown weary and quit. But Mr. Scott was quite vain of the shape of his head, for well he might be, since several choice sonnets had been combed out of it. Sometimes when the wine went round and things grew merry, then sentimental, then confidential, Scott would snatch off his wig to display to the company his fine phrenological development, and tell a story about Nelson who too used to wear a wig just like his and after every battle would take it off and hand it over to his valet to have the bullets combed out of it.

The elder Rossetti died in this house and was carried to Christ Church in Woburn Square, and thence to Highgate. His excellent wife waited to see the genius of her children blossom and acknowledged. She followed thirty years later and was buried in the same grave with her husband, where later Christina was to join them.

Frances Mary Polidori was born at 42 Broad Street, Golden Square, the same street in which William Blake was born. I found the street and found Golden Square but could not locate the house. The policeman on the beat declared that no one by the name of Rossetti or Blake was in business thereabouts; and further he never heard of Polly Dory.

William Michael Rossetti's home is one in a row of houses called St. Edmund's Terrace. It is near the St. John's Road

Station, just a step from Regent's Park, and faces the Middlesex Water Works. It is a fine old house, built of stone I should judge, stuccoed on the outside. With a well-known critic I called there, and found the master wearing a long dressing-gown that came to his heels, a pair of new carpet slippers and a black plush cap, all so dusty that we guessed the owner had been sifting ashes in the cellar. He was most courteous and polite. He worships at the shrine of Whitman, Emerson, and Thoreau, and regards America as the spot from whence must come the world's intellectual hope. "Great thoughts, like beautiful flowers, are produced by transplantation and the commingling of many elements." These are his words, and the fact that the Rossetti genius is the result of transplanting need not weigh in the scale as 'gainst the truth of the remark. Shortly after this call, at an Art Exhibition, I again met William Michael Rossetti. I talked with him some moments—long enough to discover that he was not aware we had ever met. This caused me to be rather less in love with the Rossetti genius than I was before.

The wife of Dante Gabriel Rossetti died, aged twenty-nine, at 14 Chatham Place, near Blackfriars Bridge. The region thereabouts has been changed by the march of commerce, and if the original house where the artist lived yet stands I could not find it. It was here that the Pre-Raphaelites made history—Madox Brown, Burne-Jones, Ruskin, William Morris, and the MacDonalds. Burne-Jones married one of the MacDouald daughters; Mr. Poynter, now Director of the National Gallery, another; Mr. Kipling still another—with Rudyard Kipling as a result, followed in due course by Mulvaney, Ortheris, and Leary who are quite as immortal as the rest.

At this time Professor Rossetti was dead, and William Michael, Marie, Christina, and the widowed mother were living at 166 Albany Street, fighting off various hungry wolves that crouched around the door. Albany Street is rather shabby now, and was then, I suppose. At 112 Albany Street lives one Dixon who takes marvellous photographs of animals in the Zoölogical Gardens, with a pocket camera, and then enlarges the pictures a hundred times. These pictures go the round world over and command big prices. Mr. Dixon was taking for me, at the National Gallery, the negatives from which I made photogravures for my Ruskin-Turner book. Mr. Dixon knows more in an artistic and literary way than any man in London (I believe), but he is a modest gentleman and only emits his facts under cross-examination or under the spell of inspiration. Together we visited the house 166 Albany Street.

It was vacant at the time and we rummaged through every room, with the result that we concluded it makes very little difference where genius is housed. On one of the windows of a little bedroom we found the word "Christina" cut with a diamond. When and by whom it was done I do not know. Surely the Rossettis had no diamonds when they lived here. But Mr. Dixon had a diamond and with his ring he cut beneath the word just noted the name, "Dante Gabriel Rossetti." I have recently heard that the signature has been identified as authentic by a man who was familiar with the Rossettis' handwriting.

When the firm of Morris & Co., Dealers in Art Fabrics, was gotten under weigh, and Dante Gabriel had ceased to argue details with that pre-eminently sane man, William Morris, his finances began to prosper. Morris directed and utilized the energies of his partners. He marshalled their virtues into a solid phalanx and marched them on to victory. No doubt but that genius usually requires a keeper. But Morris was a genius himself and a giant in more ways than one, for he ruled his own spirit, thus proving himself greater than one who taketh a city.

In 1862, we find Dante Gabriel throwing out the fact that his income was equal to about ten thousand dollars a year. He took the beautiful house No. 18 Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, near the little street where lived a Scotchman by the name of Thomas Carlyle, and in the same block where afterwards lived George Eliot, and where she died. He wanted his brother and sisters and his mother to share his prosperity, and so he planned that they should all come and live with him; and besides, Mr. Swinburne and Mr. George Meredith were to come too. It was to be one big happy family. But the good old mother knew the human heart better than her brilliant son. She has left on record these words: "Yes, my children all have talent, great talent; I only wish they had a little common sense!"

So for the present she remained with William, her daughters, and her two aged unmarried sisters in the plain old house in Albany Street. But Dante Gabriel moved to Cheyne Walk, and began that craze for collecting blue china that has swept like a blight over the civilized world. His collection was sold for $3,500.00 some years after—to pay his debts—less than one half of what it cost him. Yet when he had money he generously divided it with the folks up in Albany Street. But by and by William, too, got to making money and the quarters at No. 166 were abandoned for something better.

William was married and had taken a house of his own, I don't know where. The rest of the household consisted of the widow, Mrs. Rossetti, Miss Charlotte Lydia Polidori, Miss Eliza Harriet Polidori, Maria, and Christina—and seven cats. And so we find this family of five women living in peace and comfort with their books and pictures and cats at No. 30 Torrington Square in a drowsy, faded, ebb-tide mansion. Maria was never strong ; she fell into a decline and passed away. The management of the household then devolved on Christina. Her burdens must have been heavy in those days, or did she make them light by cheerful doing? She gave up society, refused the thought of marriage and joined that unorganized sisterhood of mercy—the women who toil that others may live. But she sang at her work, as the womanly woman ever does. For although a woman may hold no babe in her arms, the lullaby leaps to her tongue, and at eventide she sings songs to the children of her brain—sweet idealization of the principle of mother-love.

Christina Rossetti comes to us as one of those splendid stars that are so far away they are seen only at rare intervals. She never posed as a “literary person” —reading her productions at four-o’clocks and winning high praise from the unbonneted, and the discerning society editor. She never even sought a publisher. Her first volume of verses was issued by her grandfather Polidori unknown to her—printed by his own labor when she was seventeen and presented to her. What a surprise it must have been to this gentle girl to have one of her own books placed in her hands! There seems to have been an almost holy love in this proud man's heart for his granddaughter. His love was blind, or near-sighted at least, as love is apt to be (and I am glad!) for some of the poems in this little volume are sorry stuff. Later, her brothers issued her work and found market for it; and once we find Dante Gabriel almost quarrelling with that worthy Manxman, Hall Caine, because the Manxman was compiling a volume of the best English sonnets and threatening to leave Christina Rossetti out.

Christina had the faculty of seizing beautiful moments, exalted feelings, sublime emotions and working them up into limpid song that comes echoing to us as from across soft seas. In all of her lines there is a half sobbing undertone—the sweet minor chord that is ever present in the songs of the Choir Invisible, whose music is the gladness as well as the sadness of the world.

I have a dear friend who is an amateur photographic artist, which be it known is quite a different thing from a kodak fiend. The latter is continually snapping a machine at incongruous things ; he delights in catching people in absurd postures ; he pictures the foolish, the irrelevant, the transient and the needless. But what does my friend picture ? I'll tell you. He catches pictures only of beautiful objects : swaying stalks of goldenrod, flights of thistle-down, lichen on old stone walls, barks of trees, oak leaves, bunches of acorns, single sprays of apple-blossoms. Last spring he found two robins building a nest in a cherry tree : he placed his camera near them, and attaching a fine wire to spring the shutter, took a picture of Mr. and Mrs. Robin-red-breast laying down the first coarse straws for their nest. Then he took a picture every day for thirty days of that nest; from the time four speckled eggs are shown until four wide open mouths are held up hungrily for dainty grubs. This series of photographs forms an Epic of Creation. So if you ask me to solve the question of whether photography is art I'll answer, it all depends upon what you picture, and how you present it.

Christina Rossetti focused her thought on the beautiful object and at the best angle, so the picture she brings us is nobly ordered and richly suggestive.

And so the days passed in study, writing, housework, and caring for old ladies three. Dante Gabriel, talented, lovable, erratic, had gotten into bad ways, as a man will who turns night into day and tries to get the start of God Almighty, thinking he has found a substitute for exercise and oxygen. Finally he was taken to Birchington, on the Isle of Thanet (where Octave found her name).

He was mentally ill, to a point where he had through his delusions driven away all his old-time friends. Christina, aged fifty-one, and the mother, aged eighty-two, went to take care of him, and they did for him with all the loving tenderness what they might have done for a sick baby ; but with this difference—they had to fight his strength. Yet still there were times when his mind was sweet and gentle as in the days of old ; and toward the last these periods of restful peace increased, and there were hours when the brother, sister, and aged mother held sweet converse, almost as when children they were taught at this mother's knee. Dante Gabriel Rossetti died April 9, 1892. His grave is in the old country churchyard at Birchington.

Two years afterward the mother passed out ; in 1890, Eliza Polidori died, aged eighty-seven ; and, in 1893, her sister Charlotte joined her, aged eighty-four. In Christ's Church, Woburn Square, you can see memorial tablets to these fine souls, and if you get acquainted with the gentle old rector he will show you a pendant star and crescent, set with diamonds, given by the Sultan during the Crimean war, "To Miss Charlotte Lydia Polidori for distinguished services as Nurse." And he will also show you a silver communion set marked with the names of these three sisters followed by that of "Christina Georgiana Rossetti."

And so they all went to their soul's rest and left Christina alone in the big house with its echoing halls—too big by half for its lonely, simple-hearted mistress and her pets. She felt that her work was done, and feeling so, the end soon came. She died December 29, 1894—passing from a world that she had never much loved, where she had lived a life of sacrifice, suffering many partings, enduring many pains. Glad to go, rejoicing that the end was nigh, and soothed by the thought that beyond lay a Future, she fell asleep.

ROSA BONHEUR.

The boldness of her conceptions is sublime. As a creative Artist I place her first among women, living or dead. And if you ask me why she thus towers above her fellows, by the majesty of her work silencing every detractor, I will say it is because she listens to God, and not to man. She is true to self.

I.

WHEN I arrive in Paris I always go first to the Y. M. C. A. headquarters in the Rue de Treville—that fine building erected and presented to the Association by Banker Stokes of New York. There's a good table d'hôte dinner there every day for a franc; then there are bath-rooms and writing-rooms and reading-rooms, and all are yours if you are a stranger. The polite secretary does not look like a Christian: he has a very tight hair-cut, a Van Dyke beard and lists of lodgings that can be had for twenty, fifteen, or ten francs a week. Or should you be an American Millionaire and be willing to pay thirty francs a week the secretary knows a nice Protestant lady who will rent you her front parlor on the first floor and serve you coffee each morning without extra charge.

Not being a millionaire I decided, the last time I was there, on a room at fifteen francs a week on the fourth floor. A bright young fellow was called up, duly introduced, and we started out to inspect the quarters.

The house we wanted was in a little side street that leads off the Boulevard Montmartre. It was a very narrow and plain little street and I was a bit disappointed. Yet it was not a shabby street for there are none such in Paris ; all was neat and clean, and as I caught sight of a bird cage hanging in one of the windows and a basket of ferns in another I was reassured and rang the bell.

The landlady wore a white cap, a winning smile, and a big white apron. A bunch of keys dangling from her belt gave the necessary look of authority.

---

She was delighted to see me—everybody is glad to see you in Paris—and she would feel especially honored if I would consent to remain under her roof. She only rented her rooms to those who were sent to her by her friends, and among her few dear friends none were so dear as Monsieur ze Secretaire of ze Young Men Christians.

And so I was shown the room—away up and up and up a dark winding stairway of stone steps with an iron balustrade. It was a room about the size of a large Jordan-Marsh dry goods box. The only thing that tempted me to stay was the fact that the one window was made up of little diamond panes set in leaden sash, and that this window looked out on a little courtway where a dozen palms and as many ferns grew lush and green in green tubs and where in the centre a fountain spurted. So a bargain was struck and the landlady went down stairs to find her husband to send him to the Gare St. Lazare after my luggage.

What a relief it is to get settled in your own room ! It is home and this is your castle. You can do as you please here ; can I not take mine ease in mine inn ?

I took off my coat and hung it on the corner of the high bed post of the narrow little bed and hung my collar and cuffs on the floor ; and then leaned out of the window indulging in a drowsy dream of sweet content. 'T was a long dusty ride from Dieppe, but who cares—I was now settled, with rent paid for a week !

All around the courtway were flower boxes in the windows ; down below, the fountain cheerfully bubbled and gurgled, and from clear off in the unseen rumbled the traffic of the great city. And coming from somewhere, as I sat there, was the shrill warble of a canary. I looked down and around but could not see the feathered songster, as the novelists always call a bird. Then I followed the advice of the Epworth League and looked up, not down, out, not in, and there directly over my head hung the cage all tied up in chiffon (I think it was chiffon). I was surprised, for I felt sure it could not be possible there was a room higher than mine—when I had come up nine stairways! Then I was more surprised, for just as I looked up a woman looked down and our eyes met. We both smiled a foolish smile of surprise; she dodged in her head and I gazed at the houses opposite with an interest quite unnecessary.

She was not a very young woman, nor very pretty—in fact she was rather plain but when she leaned out to feed her pet and found a man looking up at her she proved her divine femininity beyond cavil. Was there ever a more womanly action? And I said to myself, “She is not handsome but God bless her, she is human!”

Details are tiresome—so suffice it to say that next day the bird-cage was lowered that I might divide my apple with Dickie (for Dickie was very fond of apple). On the second day when the cage was lowered I not only fed Dickie but wrote a message on the cuttle-fish. On the third day there was a note twisted in the wires of the cage inviting me up to tea.

Rosa Bonheur

II.

FOUR girls lived up there in one attic room. Two of these girls were Americans, one English and one French. One of the American girls was round and pink and twenty ; the other was older. It was the older one that owned the bird, and invited me up to tea. She met me at the door and we shook hands like old-time friends. I was introduced to the trinity in a dignified manner and we were soon chatting in a way that made Dickie envious and he sang so loudly that one of the girls covered the cage with a black apron.

With four girls I felt perfectly safe, and as for the girls there was not a shadow of a doubt but that they were safe, for I am a married man. I knew they must be nice girls for they had birds and flower boxes. I knew they had flower boxes for twice it so happened that they sprinkled the flowers while I was leaning out of the window wrapped in reverie.

This attic was the most curious room I ever saw. It was large—running clear across the house. It had four gable windows and the ceiling sloped down on the sides so there was danger of bumping your head if you played pussy-wants-a-corner. Each girl had a window that she called her own, and the chintz curtains, made of chiffon (I think it was chiffon) were tied back with different colored ribbons. This big room was divided in the centre by a curtain made of gunny-sack stuff and this curtain was covered with pictures such as were never seen on land or sea. The walls were papered with brown wrapping paper, tacked up with brass-headed nails, and this paper was covered with pictures such as were never seen on sea or land.

The girls were all art students and when they had nothing else to do they worked on the walls, I imagined, just as the Israelites did in Jerusalem years ago. One half of the attic was studio and this was where the table was set. The other half of the attic had curious chairs and divans and four little iron beds enamelled in white and gold, and each bed was so smoothly made up that I asked what they were for. White Pigeon said they were bric-a-brac—that the Attic Philosophers rolled themselves up in the rugs on the floor when they wished to sleep, but I have thought since that White Pigeon was chaffing me.

White Pigeon was the one I saw that first afternoon when I looked up, not down, out, not in. She was from White Pigeon, Michigan, and from the very moment I told her I had a cousin living at Coldwater who was a conductor on the Lake Shore, we were as brother and sister. White Pigeon was thirty or thirty-five mebbe; she had some grey hairs mixed in with the brown and at times there was a tinge of melancholy in her laugh and a sort of half minor key in her voice. I think she had had a Past but I don't know for sure.

Women under thirty seldom know much, unless Fate has been kind and cuffed them thoroughly, so the little peach-blow Americaine did not interest me. The peach-blow was all gone from White Pigeon's cheek, but she was fairly wise and reasonably good—I'm certain of that. She called herself a student and spoke of her pictures as "studies," but she had lived in Paris ten years. Peach-blow was her pupil—sent over from Bradford, Pennsylvania, where her father was a "producer." White Pigeon told me this after I had drunk five cups of tea and the Anglaise and Soubrette were doing the dishes. Peachblow the while was petulantly taking the color out of a canvas that was a false alarm.

White Pigeon had copied a Correggio in the J,ouvre nine years before, and sold the canvas to a rich wagon-maker from South Bend. Then orders came from South Bend for six more copies of Louvre master-pieces. It took a year to complete the order and brought White Pigeon a thousand dollars. She kept on copying and occasionally received orders from America, and when no orders came pot-boilers were duly done and sent to worthy Hebrews in St. Louis who hold annual Art Receptions and sell at auction paintings painted by distinguished artists with unpronounceable names, who send a little of their choice work to St. Louis, because the people in St. Louis appreciate really choice things.

“And the mural decorations—which one of you did those?” I remarked, as a long pause came stealing in.

“Did you hear what Mr. Littlejourneys asked?” called White Pigeon to the others.

“No, what was it?”

“He wants to know which one of us decorated the walls!”

Rosa Bonheur

“Mr. Littlejourneys meant illumined the walls,” jerked Peachblow, over her shoulder.

Then Anglaise gravely brought a battered box of crayon and told me I must make a picture somewhere on the wall or ceiling—all the pictures were made by visitors—no visitor was ever exempt.

I took the crayons and made a picture such as was never seen on land or sea. Having thus placed myself on record I began to examine the other decorations. There were heads and faces, and architectural scraps, trees and animals, and bits of landscape and ships that pass in the night. Most of the work was decidedly sketchy, but some of the faces were very good.

Suddenly my eye spied the form of a sleeping dog, a great shaggy St. Bernard with head outstretched on his paws, sound asleep. I stopped and whistled.

The girls laughed.

“It is only the picture of a dog,” said Soubrette.

Rosa Bonheur

---

“I know, but you should pay dog-tax on such a picture—did you draw it?” I asked White Pigeon.

“Did I! If I could draw like that would I copy pictures in the Louvre?”

“Well, who drew it?”

“Can’t you guess?”

“Of course I can guess. I am a Yankee—I guess Rosa Bonheur.”

“Well, you have guessed right.”

“Stop joking and tell me who drew the St. Bernard.”

“Madame Rosalie, or Rosa Bonheur, as you call her.”

“But she never came here!”

“Yes, she did—once. Soubrette is her great grandniece, or something.”

“Yes, and Madame Bonheur pays my way and keeps me in the École des Beaux Arts. I ’m not ashamed for Monsieur Littlejourneys to know!” said Soubrette with a pretty pout; “I ’m from Lyons, and my mother and Madame Rosalie used to know each other years ago.”

Rosa Bonheur

“ Will Madame Rosalie, as you call her, ever come here again ? ”

“ Perhaps.”

“ Then I ’ll camp right here till she comes ! ”

“ You might stay a year and then be disappointed.”

“ Then can’t we go to see her ? ”

“ Never : she does not see visitors.”

“ We might go visit her home.” mused Soubrette, after a pause.

“ Yes, if she is away,” said Anglaise.

“ She ’s away now,” said Soubrette, “ she went to Rouen yesterday.”

“ Well, when shall we go ? ”

“ To-morrow.”

III.

AND so Soubrette could not think of going when it looked so much like rain, and Anglaise could not think of going without Soubrette, and Peachblow was getting nervous about the coming examinations, and must study as she knew she would just die if she failed to pass.

“ You will anyway—sometime ! ” said White Pigeon.

“ Don’t urge her ; she may change her mind and go with you,” dryly remarked Anglaise with back towards us as she dusted the mantel.

Then I expressed my regret that the trinity could not go, and White Pigeon expressed her regret because they had to stay at home. And as we went down the stairs together we chanted the Kyrie Eleison for our small sins, easing conscience by the mutual confession that we were arrant hypocrites.

Rosa Bonheur

“But still,” mused White Pigeon, not quite satisfied, “we really did not tell an untruth—that is we did not deceive them—they understood—I would n’t tell a real whopper, would you?”

“I don’t know—I think I did once.”

“Tell me about it,” said White Pigeon.

But I was saved, for just as we reached the bottom stair there was a slight jingling of keys, and the landlady came up through the floor with a big lunch-basket. She pushed the basket into my hands and showering us with Lombardy French, pushed us out of the door, and away we went into the morning grey, the basket carried between us. The basket had a hinged cover, and out of one corner emerged the tell-tale neck of a bottle. It did not look just right; suppose we should meet someone from Coldwater?

But we did not meet anyone from Coldwater. And when we reached the railway station we were quite lost in the crowd, for there were dozens of picnickers all carrying baskets, and from the cover of each basket emerged the neck of a bottle. We felt quite at home packed away in a Classe Trois carriage with a chattering party of six High-School botanizing youngsters. When the guard came to the window, touched his cap, addressing me as Le Professeur, and asked for the tickets for my family they all laughed.

Rosa Bonheur

Fontainebleau was the fourth stop from Paris. My family scampered out and away and we followed leisurely after. Fontainebleau is quite smug. There is a fashionable hotel near the station before which a fine tall fellow in uniform parades. He looked at our basket with contempt, and we looked at him in pity. Just beyond the hotel are smart shops with windows filled with many-colored trifles to tempt the tourist. The shops gradually grew smaller and less gay, and residences with high stone walls in front took their places, and over these walls roses nodded. Then there came a wide stretch of pasture and the town of Fontainebleau was left behind.

The sun came out and came out and came out ; birds chirruped in the hedgerows and the daws in the high poplars called and scolded. The mist still lingered on the distant hills and we could hear the tinkle of sheep-bells, and the barking of a dog coming out of the nothingness.

White Pigeon wore flat-soled shoes and measured off the paces with an easy swing. We walked in silence, filled with the rich quiet of country sounds and country sights. What a relief to get away from noisy, bustling, busy Paris. God made the country !

All at once the mists seemed to lift from the long range of hills on the right and revealed the dark background of forest, broken here and there with jutting rocks and beetling crags. We stopped and sat down on the bank-side to view the scene. Close up under the shadow of the dark forest nestled a little white village. Near it was the red tile roof of an old mansion, half lost in the foliage. All around this old mansion I could make out a string of small buildings or additions to the original chateau.

I looked at White Pigeon and she looked at me.

“Yes, that is the place!” she said.

The sun's rays were growing warmer. I took off my coat and tucked it through the handle of the basket. White Pigeon took off her jacket to keep it company, and toting the basket, slung on my cane between us, we moved on up the gently winding way to the village of By. Everybody was asleep at By, or else gone on a journey. Soon we came to the old massive moss-covered gate-posts that marked the entrance to the mansion. A chain was stretched across the entrance and we crawled under. The driveway was partially over-grown with grass, and the place seemed to be taking care of itself. Half a dozen long-horned Bonnie Brier Bush cows were grazing on the lawn, their calves with them; and evidently these cows and calves were the only mowing machines employed. On this wide-stretching meadow were various old trees; one elm I saw had fallen split through the centre, each part prostrate yet growing green.

Close up about the house there was an irregular stone wall and an ornamental iron gate with a pull-out Brugglesmith bell to one side. We pulled the bell and were answered by a big shaggy St. Bernard that came barking and bouncing around the corner. I thought at first our time had come. But this giant of a dog only approached within about ten feet then lay down on the grass and rolled over three times to show his good-will. He got up with a fine cheery smile shown in the wag of his tail, just as a little maid unlocked the gate.

“Don’t you know that dog?” asked White Pigeon.

Rosa Bonheur

“Certainement—he is on the wall of your room.”

We were shown into a little reception parlor, where we were welcomed by a tall, handsome woman, about White Pigeon’s age. The woman kissed White Pigeon on one cheek, and I afterwards asked White Pigeon why she did n’t turn to me the other, and she said I was a fool.

Then the tall woman went to the door and called up the stairway :

“ Antoine, Antoine, guess who it is? it ’s White Pigeon ! ”

A man came down the stairs three steps at a time and took both of White Pigeon’s hands in his, after the hearty manner of a gentleman of France. Then I was introduced.

Antoine looked at our lunch basket with the funniest look I ever saw, and asked what it was.

“ Lunch ” said White Pigeon, “ I cannot tell a lie ! ”

Rosa Bonheur

But White Pigeon explained that we only came on a quiet picnic in search of ozone and had dropped in to make a little call before we went on up to the forest. But could we see the horses?

Antoine would be most delighted to show Monsieur Littlejourneys anything that was within his power. In fact everything hereabouts was the absolute property of Monsieur Littlejourneys to do with as he pleased.

He disappeared up the stairway to exchange his slippers for shoes and the tall woman went in another direction for her hat. I whispered to White Pigeon, "Can't we see the studio?"

"Are we from Chicago that we should seek to prowl through a private house, when the mistress is away?—No, there are partly finished canvases up there that are sacred."

"Come this way," said Antoine. He led us out through the library, then the dining-room and through the kitchen.

It is a very comfortable old place, with no extra furniture—the French know better than to burden themselves with things.

The long line of brick stables seemed made up of a beggarly array of empty stalls. We stopped at a paddock and Antoine opened the gate and said, “There they are !”

“What?”

“The horses.”

“But these are brouchos.”

“Yes, I believe that is what you call them. Monsieur Bill of Buffalo, New York, sent them as a present to Madame Rosalie when he was in Paris.”

There they were—two ewe-necked kiuses—one a pinto with a wall eye; the other a dun with a black line down the back.

I challenged Antoine to saddle them and we would ride. The tall lady took it in dead earnest and throwing her arms around Antoine’s neck begged him not to commit suicide.

Rosa Bonheur

“And the Percherons—where are they?”

“Goodness! we have no Perches.”

“Those that served as models for the ‘Horse Fair,’ I mean.”

White Pigeon took me gently by the sleeve, and turning to the others apologized for my ignorance, explaining that I did not know the Marché aux Chevaux was painted over forty years ago, and that the models were all Paris cart horses.

Antoine called up a little old man who led out two shaggy little cobs, and I was told that these were the horses that Madame drove. A roomy, old-fashioned basket phaeton was backed out; White Pigeon and I stepped in to try it and Antoine drew us once around the stable yard. This is the only carriage Madame uses. There were doves, and chickens, and turkeys, and rabbits, and these horses we had seen, with the cows on the lawn, make up all the animals owned by the greatest of living animal painters.

Rosa Bonheur

Years ago Rosa Bonheur had a stable full of horses and a kennel of dogs and a park with deer. Many animals were sent as presents. One man forwarded a lion, and another a brace of tigers, but Madame made haste to present them to the Zoölogical Garden at Paris, because the folks at By would not venture out of their houses—a report having been spread that the lions were loose.

“An animal painter no more wants to own the objects he paints than a landscape artist wishes a deed for the mountain he is sketching,” said Antoine.

“Or to marry his model,” interposed White Pigeon.

“If you see your model too often you will lose her,” added the Tall Lady.

We bade our friends good-bye and trudged on up the hillside to the storied Forest of Fontainebleau. We sat down on a log and watched the winding Seine stretching away like a monstrous serpent, away down across the meadow; just at our feet was the white village of By; beyond was Thomeray, and off to the left rose the spires of Fontainebleau.

“And who is this Autoine and who is the Tall Lady?” I asked, as White Pigeon began to unpack the basket.

“I must hear it.”

And so between bites White Pigeon told me the story.

The Tall Lady is a niece of Madame Rosalie’s. She was married to an army officer at Bordeaux when she was sixteen years old. Her husband treated her shamefully; he beat her and forced her to write begging letters and to borrow money of her relatives and then he would take this money and waste it gambling and in drink. In short he was a Brute.

Madame Rosalie accidentally heard of all this and one day went down to Bordeaux and took the Tall Lady away from the Brute and told him she would kill him if he followed.

Rosa Bonheur

“Did she paint a picture of the Brute?”

“Keep quiet, please.”

She told him she would kill him if he followed, and although she is usually very gentle I believe she would have kept her word. Well, she brought the Tall Lady with her to By and this old woman and this young woman loved each other very much.

Now Madame Rosalie had a butler and combination man of business, by name Jules Carmonne. He was a painter of some ability and served Madame in many ways right faithfully. Jules loved the Tall Lady, or said he did, but she did not care for him. He was near fifty and asthmatic and had watery eyes. He made things very uncomfortable for the Tall Lady.

One night Jules came to Madame Rosalie in great indignation and said he could not consent to remain longer on account of the way things were going on. What was the trouble? Trouble enough when the Tall Lady was sneaking out of the house after decent folks were in bed, to meet a strange man down in the evergreens! well I guess so!!

How did he know?

Ah, he had followed her. Moreover he had concealed himself in the evergreens and waited for them, to make sure.

Yes, and who was the man?

A young rogue of a painter from Fontainebleau named Antoine De Channeville.

Madame Rosalie took Jules Carmoune at his word. She said she was sorry he could not stay but he might go if he wished to, of course. And she paid him his salary on the spot—with two months more to the end of the year.

The next day Madame Rosalie drove her team of shaggy ponies down to Fontainebleau and called on the young rogue of an artist. He came out bare-headed and quaking to where she sat in the phaeton waiting. She flected the off pony twice and told him that as Car-monne had left her she must have a man to help her. Would he come? And she named as salary a sum about five times what he was then making.

Rosa Bonheur

Antoine De Channeville seized the wheel of the phaeton for support, gasped several gasps, and said he would come.

He was getting barely enough to eat out of his work, anyway, although he was a very worthy young fellow.

And he came.

He and the Tall Lady were married about six months after.

“And about the Brute and—and the divorce!”

“Gracious goodness! How do I know? I guess the Brute died or something; anyway, Antoine and the Tall Lady are man and wife, and are devoted lovers besides. They have served Madame Rosalie most loyally for these fifteen years. They say Madame has made her will and left them the mansion and everything in it for their ownest own, with a tidy sum beside to put on interest.”

It was four o'clock when we got back to the railroad station at Fontainebleau. We missed the train we expected to take, and had an hour to wait. White Pigeon said she did not care so very much, and I'm sure I did n't. So we sat down in the bright little waiting-room, and White Pigeon told me many things about Madame Rosalie and her early life that I had never known before.

IV.

EARLY in the century there lived in Bordeaux a struggling artist (artists always struggle, you know) by the name of Raymond Bonheur. He found life a cruel thing, for bread was high in price and short in weight, and no one seemed to appreciate art except the folks who had no money to buy. But the poor can love as well as the rich, and Raymond married. In his nervous desire for success, Raymond Bonheur said that if he could only have a son he would teach him how to do it, and the son would achieve the honors that the world withheld from the father.

So the days came and went, and a son was expected—a first-born—an heir. There was n't anything to be heir to except genius, but there was plenty of that. The heir was to bear the name of the father—Raymond Bonheur. Prayers were offered and thanksgivings sung.

The days were fulfilled. The child was born.

The heir was a girl.

Raymond Bonheur cursed wildly and towseled his hair like a bonffé artist. He swore he had been tricked, trapped, seduced, undone. He would have bought strong drink, but he had no money, and credit, like hope, was gone.

The little mother cried.

But the baby grew, although it was n't a very big baby. They named her Rosa, because the initial was the same as Raymond, but they always called her Rosalie.

Then in a year another baby came, and that was a boy. In two years another, but Raymond never forgave his wife that first offence. He continued to struggle, trying various styles of pictures and ever hoping he would yet hit on what the public desired. Mr. Vanderbilt had not yet made his famous remark about the public, and how could Raymond plagiarize it in advance?

At last he got money enough to get to Paris—ah, yes, Paris, Paris, there talent is appreciated!

In Paris another baby was born—it was looked upon as a calamity. The poor little mother of the four little shivering Bonheurs ceased to struggle. She lay quite still, and they covered her face with a white sheet and talked in whispers, and walked on tiptoe, for she was dead.

When an artist cannot succeed he begins to teach art—that is, he shows others how. Raymond Bonheur put his four children out among kinsmen in four different places, and became drawing-master in a private school.

Rosa Bonheur was ten years old: a pug-nosed, square-faced little girl in a linsey-woolsey dress, wooden shoon, with a yellow braid hanging down her back tied with shoe-string. She could draw

—all children can draw—and the first things children draw are animals. Her father had taught her a little and laughed at her foolish little lions and tigers, all duly labelled.

When twelve years of age the good people with whom she lived said she must learn dressmaking. She should be an artist of the needle. But after some months she rebelled and, making her way across the city to where her father was, demanded that he should teach her drawing. Raymond Bonheur had n't much will—this controversy proved that—the child mastered, and the father, who really was an accomplished draughtsman, began giving daily lessons to the girl. Soon they worked together in the Louvre, copying pictures.

It was a queer thing to teach a girl art—there were no women artists then. People laughed to see a little girl with a yellow braid mixing paints and helping her father in the Louvre; others said it was n't right.

Rosa Bonheur

“ Let 's cut off the braid, and I 'll wear boy's clothes and be a boy,” said funny little Rosalie.

Next day Raymond Bonheur had a close-cropped boy in loose trousers and blue blouse to help him.

The pictures they copied began to sell. Buyers said the work was strong and true. Prosperity came that way, and Raymond Bonheur got his four children together and rented three rooms in a house at 157 Faubourg Saint Honoré.

Rosalie saw that her father had always tried to please the public ; she would please no one but herself. He had tried many forms ; she would stick to one. She would paint animals and nothing else.

When eighteen years old she painted a picture of rabbits, for the Salon. The next year she tried again. She made the acquaintance of an honest old farmer at Villiers and went to live in his household. She painted pictures of all the live-stock he possessed, from rabbits to a Norman stallion. One of the pictures she then made was that of a favorite Holland cow. A collector came down from Paris and offered three hundred francs for the picture.

“Merciful Jesus!” said the pious farmer; “say nothing, but get the money quick. The live cow herself is n’t worth half that!”

The members of the Bonheur family married, one by one, including the father. Rosa did not marry: she painted. She discarded all teachers, all schools; she did not even listen to the suggestions of patrons, and even refused to make pictures to order. And be it said to her credit, she never has allowed a buyer to dictate the subject. She followed her own ideas in everything; she wore men’s clothes, and does even unto this day.

When she was twenty-five the Salon awarded her a gold medal. The Ministère des Beaux Arts paid her three thousand francs for her Labourge Nivernais.

Raymond Bonheur grew ill in 1849,

but before he passed out he realized that his daughter, then twenty-seven years old, was on a level with the greatest masters, living or dead.

She began The Horse Fair when twenty-eight. It was the largest canvas ever attempted by an animal painter. It was exhibited at the Salon in 1853, and all the gabble of jealous competitors was lost in the glorious admiration it excited. It became the rage of Paris. All the honors the Salon could bestow were heaped upon the young woman, and by special decision all of her work henceforth was declared exempt from examination by the Jury of Admission. Rosa Bonheur, five feet four, weighing 120 pounds, was bigger than the Salon.

But success did not cause her to swerve a hair's-breadth from her manner of work or life. She refused all social invitations, and worked away after her own method as industriously as ever. When a picture was completed she set her price on it and it was sold.

In 1860 she bought this fine old house at By, that she might work in quiet. Society tried to follow her, and in 1864 the Emperor Napoleon and Princess Eugénie went to By, and the Princess pinned to the blue blouse of Rosa Bonheur the Cross of the Legion of Honor, the first time, I believe, that the distinction was ever conferred on a woman.

And now at seventy-four she is still in love with life, and while taking a woman's tender interest in all sweet and gentle things, has yet an imagination that in its strength and boldness is splendidly masculine.

Rosa Bonheur has received all the honors that man can give. She is rich ; no words of praise that tongue can utter can add to her fame ; and she is beloved by all who know her.

MADAME DE STAËL

Far from gaining assurance in meeting Buonaparte oftener, he intimidated me daily more and more. I confusedly felt that no emotion of the heart could possibly take effect upon him.
He looks upon a human being as a fact or as a thing, but not as a fellow-creature. He does not hate any more than he loves; there is nothing for him but himself; all other beings are so many ciphers. The force of his will lies in the imperturbable calculation of his selfishness.

I.

FATE was very kind to Madame De Staël.

She ran the gamut of life from highest love to direst pain—from rosy dawn to blackest night. Name if you can another woman who touched life at so many points! Home, health, wealth, strength, honors, affection, applause, motherhood, loss, danger, death, defeat, sacrifice, humiliation, illness, banishment, imprisonment, escape. Again comes hope—returning strength, wealth, recognition, fame tempered by opposition, home, a few friends, and kindly death—cool, all-enfolding death.

If Harriet Martineau showed poor judgment in choosing her parents we can lay no such charge to the account of Madame De Staël.

They called her "The Daughter of Necker," and all through life she delighted in the title. The courtier who addressed her thus received a sunny smile and a gentle love tap on his cheek for pay. A splendid woman is usually the daughter of her father, just as strong men have noble mothers.

Jacques Necker was born in Geneva and went up to the city, like many another country boy, to make his fortune. He carried with him to Paris innocence, health, high hope, and twenty francs in silver. He found a place as porter or "trotter" in a bank. Soon they made him clerk.

A letter came one day from a correspondent asking for a large loan and setting forth a complex financial scheme in which the bank was invited to join. M. Vernet, the head of the establishment, was away and young Necker took the matter in hand. He made a detailed statement of the scheme, computed probable losses, weighed the pros and cons, and when the employer returned, the plan, all worked out, was on his desk, with young Necker's advice that the loan be made.

"You seem to know all about banking?" was the sarcastic remark of M. Vernet.

"I do," was the proud answer.

"You know too much, I'll just put you back as porter."

The Genevese accepted the reduction and went back as porter without repining. A man of small sense would have resigned his situation at once, just as men are ever forsaking Fortune when she is about to smile; witness Cato committing suicide on the very eve of success.

There is always a demand for efficient men, the market is never glutted; the cities are hungry for them—but the trouble is few men are efficient.

"It was none of his business!" said M. Vernet to his partner, trying to ease conscience with reasons.

"Yes, but see how he accepted the inevitable!"

Madame De Staël

“Ah! true, he has two qualities that are only the property of strong men: confidence and resignation—I think—I think I was hasty!”

So young Necker was reinstated and in six months was cashier; in three years a partner.

Not long after, he married Susanna Curchod, a poor governess. But Mlle. Curchod was rich in mental endowment: refined, gentle, spiritual, she was a true mate to the high-minded Necker. She was a Swiss too, and if you know how a young man and a young woman, country born, in a strange city are attracted to each other you will better understand this particular situation.

Some years before, Gibbon had loved and courted the beautiful Mademoiselle Curchod in her quiet home in the Jura Mountains. They became engaged. Gibbon wrote home, breaking the happy news to his parents.

“Has the beautiful Curchod of whom

you sing, a large dowry?" enquired the mother.

"She has no dowry! I cannot tell a lie," was the meek answer. The mother came on and extinguished the match in short order.

Gibbon never married. But he frankly tells us all about his love for Susanna Curchod and relates how he visited her, years after, in her splendid Paris home. "She greeted me without embarrassment," says Gibbon, resentfully, "and in the evening Necker left us together in the parlor, bade me good-night, and lighting a candle went off to bed!"

Gibbon, historian and philosopher, was made of common clay (for authors are made of clay) like plain mortals, and he could not quite forgive Madame Necker for not being embarrassed on meeting her former lover, neither could he forgive Necker for not being jealous.

But that only daughter of the Neckers, Germaine, pleased Gibbon—pleased him better than the mother, and Gibbon extended his stay in Paris and called often. "She was a splendid creature," Gibbon relates—"only seventeen, but a woman grown, physically and mentally; not handsome but dazzling, brilliant, emotional, sensitive, daring!"

Madame De Staël

Gibbon was a bit of a romanticist, as all historians are, and he no doubt thought it would be a fine dénouement to life's play to capture the daughter of his old sweetheart, and avenge himself on fate and the unembarrassed Madame Necker and the unpiqued husband, all at one fell stroke—and she would not be dowerless either. Ha, ha!

But Gibbon forgot that he was past forty, short in stature, and short of breath, and "miles around," as Talleyrand put it.

"I quite like you," said the daring daughter, as the eloquent Gibbon sat by her side at a dinner.

"Why should n't you like me—I came near being your papa!"

"I know, and would I have looked like you?"

“ Perhaps,”

“ What a calamity !”

Even then she possessed that same bubbling wit that was hers years later when she sat at table with D' Alembert. On one side of the great author was Madame Récamier, famous for beauty (and later for a certain “ Beauty-Cream ”), on the other the daughter of Necker.

“ How fortunate !” exclaimed D' Alembert with rapture. “ How fortunate ! I sit between Wit and Beauty !”

“ Yes, and without possessing either,” said Wit.

No mistake, the girl's intellect was too speedy even for Gibbon. She fenced all 'round him and over him, and he soon discovered that she was icily gracious to everyone, save her father alone. For him she seemed to outpour all the lavish love of her splendid womanhood. It was unlike the usual calm affection of father and daughter. It was a great and absorbing love, of which even the mother was jealous.

Madame De Staël

“I can't just exactly make 'em out,” said Gibbon, and withdrew in good order.

Before Necker was forty he had accumulated a fortune, and retired from business to devote himself to literature and the polite arts. “I have earned a rest,” he said, “besides I must have leisure to educate my daughter.”

Men are constantly “retiring” from business, but somehow the expected Elysium of leisure forever eludes us. Necker had written several good pamphlets and showed the world that he had ability outside of money making. He was appointed Resident Minister of Geneva at the Court of France. Soon after he became President of the French East India Co., because there was no one else with mind broad enough to fill the place. His house was the gathering place of many eminent scholars and statesmen. Necker was quiet and reserved; his wife was coldly brilliant, cultured, dignified, religious. The daughter made good every deficiency in both.

She was tall, finely formed, but her features were rather heavy, and in repose there was a languor in her manner and a blankness in her face. This seeming dulness marks all great actors, but the heaviness is only on the surface ; it often covers a sleeping volcano. On recognizing an acquaintance Germaine Necker's face would be illumined, and her smile would light a room. She could pronounce a man's name so he would be ready to throw himself at her feet, or over a precipice for her. And she made it a rule to know names and to speak them. Then she could listen in a way that complimented, and by a sigh, a nod, an exclamation, bring out the best—such thoughts as a man never knew he had. She made people surprise themselves with their own genius ; thus proving that to make a good impression means to make the man pleased with himself. “ Any man can be brilliant with her,” said a nettled competitor, “ but if she wishes, she can sink all women in a room into creeping things.”

She knew how to compliment without flattering; her cordiality warmed like wine, and her ready wit, repartee, and ability to thaw all social ice, and lead conversation along any line, were accomplishments which perhaps have never been equalled. The women who "entertain" often only depress; they are so glowing that everybody else feels himself punk. And these people who are too clever are very numerous; they seem inwardly to fear rivals, and are intent on working while it is called the day.

Over against these are the celebrities who sit in a corner and smile knowingly when they are expected to scintillate. And the individual who talks too much at one time is often painfully silent at another—as if he had made New Year resolves. But the daughter of Necker entered into conversation with candor and abandon; she gave herself to others, and knew whether they wished to talk or listen. On occasion, she could monopolize conversation until she seemed the only person in the room ; but all talent was brighter for the added lustre of her own. This simplicity, this utter frankness, this complete absence of self-consciousness was like the flight of a bird that never doubts its power, simply because it never thinks of it. Yet continual power produces arrogance, and the soul unchecked finally believes in its own omniscience.

Of course such a matrimonial prize as the daughter of Necker was sought for, even fought for. But the women who can see clear through a man, like a Roentgen ray, do not invite soft demonstration. They give passion a chill. Love demands a little illusion ; it must be clothed in mystery. And although we find evidence that many youths stood in the hallways and sighed, the daughter of Necker never saw fit by a nod to bring them to her feet. She was after bigger game—she desired the admiration and approbation of archbishops, cardinals, generals, statesmen, great authors.

Germaine Necker had no conception of what love is. Many women never have. Had this fine young woman met a man with intellect as clear, mind as vivid, and heart as warm as her own, and had he pierced her through with a wit as strong and keen as she herself wielded, her pride would have been broken and she might have paused. Then they might have looked into each other's eyes and lost self there. And had she thus known love it would have been a complete passion, for the woman seemed capable of it.

A better pen than mine has written "a woman's love is a dog's love." The dog that craves naught else but the presence of his master, who is faithful to the one and whines out his life on that master's grave, waiting for the caress that never comes and the cheery voice that is never heard—that's the way a woman loves! A woman may admire, respect, revere, and obey, but she does not love until a passion seizes upon her that has in it the abandon of Niagara. Do you remember how Nancy

Sikes crawls inch by inch to reach the hand of Bill, and reaching it, tenderly caresses the coarse fingers that a moment before clutched her throat, and dies content? 'That's the love of woman! The prophet spoke of something "passing the love of women," but the prophet was wrong—there's nothing does.

So Germaine Necker, the gracious, the kindly, the charming, did not love. However, she married—married Baron De Staël, the Swedish Ambassador. He was thirty-seven, she was twenty. De Staël was good-looking, polite, educated. He always smiled at the right time, said bright things in the right way, kept silence when he should, and made no enemies because he agreed with everybody about everything. Stipulations were made; a long agreement was drawn up; it was signed by the party of the first part and duly executed by the party of the second part; sealed, witnessed, sworn to, and the priest was summoned.

It was a happy marriage. The first three years of married life were the happiest Madame De Staël ever knew, she said long afterward.

Possibly there are hasty people who will imagine they detect tincture of iron somewhere in these pages: these good people will say, "Gracious me! why not?"

And so I will admit that these respectable, well arranged, and carefully planned marriages are often happy and peaceful. The couple may "raise" a large family and slide through life and out of it without a splash. I will also admit that love does not necessarily imply happiness—more often 't is a pain, a wild yearning, and a vague unrest; a haunting sense of heart hunger that drives a man into exile repeating abstractedly the name of "Beatrice! Beatrice!"

And so all the moral I will make now is simply this: the individual who has not known an all-absorbing love has not the spiritual vision that is a passport to Paradise. He forever yammers between the worlds, fit neither for heaven nor hell.

II.

NECKER retired from business that he might enjoy peace ; his daughter married for the same reason.

It was stipulated that she should never be separated from her father. She who stipulates is lost—so far as love goes, but no matter ! Married women in France are greater lions in society than maidens can possibly hope to be. The marriage certificate serves at once as a license for brilliancy, daring, splendor, and it is also a badge of respectability. The marriage certificate is a document that in all countries is ever taken care of by the woman and never the man. And this document is especially useful in France, as French dames know. Frenchmen are afraid of an unmarried woman—she means danger, damages, a midnight marriage and other awful things. An unmarried woman in France cannot hope to be a social leader, and to be a social leader was the one ambition of Madame De Staël.

It was called the salon of Madame De Staël now. Baron De Staël was known as the husband of Madame De Staël. The salon of Madame Necker was only a matter of reminiscence. The daughter of Necker was greater than her father, and, as for Madame Necker, she was a mere figure in towering head-dress, point lace and diamonds. Talleyraud summed up the case when he said, "She is one of those dear old things that have to be tolerated."

Madame De Staël had a taste for literature from early womanhood. She wrote beautiful little essays and read them aloud to her company, and her manuscripts had a circulation like unto her father's bank notes. She had the faculty of absorbing beautiful thoughts and sentiments, and no woman ever expressed them in a more graceful way. People said she was the greatest woman author of her day. "You mean of all time," corrected Diderot. They called her "the High Priestess of Letters," "the Minerva of Poetry," "Sappho Returned," and all that. Her commendation meant success and her indifference failure. She knew politics too and her hands were on all wires. Did she wish to placate a minister, she invited him to call, and once there he was as putty in her hands. She skimmed the surface of all languages, all arts, all history, but best of all she knew the human heart.

Of course there was a realm of knowledge she wist not of—the initiates of which never ventured within her scope. She had nothing for them—they kept away. But the proud, the vain, the ambitious, the ennui-ridden, the-people-who-wish-to-be, and who are ever looking for the strong man to give them help—these thronged her parlors.

And when you have named these you have named all those who are foremost in commerce, politics, art, education, philanthropy, and religion. The world is run by second-rate people. The best are speedily crucified, or else never heard of until long after they are dead. Madame De Staël, in 1788, was queen of the people who ran the world—at least the French part of it.

But intellectual power like physical strength endures but for a day. Giants who have a giant's strength and use it like a giant must be put down. If you have intellectual power, hide it!

Do thy daily work in thine own little way and be content. The personal touch repels as well as attracts. Thy presence is a menace—thy existence an affront—beware! They are weaving a net for thy feet and hear you not the echo of hammering, as of men building a scaffold?

Go read history! thinkest thou that all men are mortal save thee alone, and that what has befallen others cannot happen to thee? The Devil has no title to this property he now promises. Fool! thou hast no more claim on Fate than they who have gone before, and what has come to others in like conditions must come to thee. God himself cannot stay it ; it is so written in the stars. Power to lead men ! Pray that thy prayer shall ne'er be granted—'t is to be carried to the topmost pinnacle of Fame's temple tower and there cast headlong upon the stones beneath. Beware ! beware !!

III.

MADAME DE STAËL, was of an intensely religious nature throughout her entire life ; such characters swing between license and ascetism. But the charge of atheism told largely against her even among the so-called liberals, for liberals are often very illiberal. Maria Antoinette gathered her skirts close about her and looked at the "Minerva of Letters" with suspicion in her big open eyes ; cabinet officers forgot her requests to call, and when a famous wit once coolly asked, "Who was that Madame De Staël we used to read about ?" people roared with laughter.

Necker, as Minister of Finance, had saved the State from financial ruin ; then been deposed and banished ; then recalled. In September, 1790, he was again compelled to flee. He escaped to Switzerland, disguised as a pedler. The daughter wished to accompany him but this was impossible, for only a week before she had given birth to her first child.

But favor came back and in the mad tumult of the times the freedom and wit and sparkle of her salon became a need to the poets and philosophers, if city wits can be so called.

Society shone as never before. In it was the good nature of the mob. It was no time to sit quietly at home and enjoy a book—men and women must “go somewhere,” they must “do something.” The women adopted the Greek costume and appeared in simple white robes caught at the shoulders with miniature stilettos. Many men wore crepe on their arms in pretended memory of friends who had been kissed by Madame Guillotine. There was fever in the air, fever in the blood, and the passions held high carnival. In solitude danger depresses all save the very strongest, but the mob (ever the symbol of weakness) is made up of women—it is an effeminate thing. It laughs hysterically at death and cries, “on with the dance.” Women represent the opposite poles of virtue.

The fever continues : a “poverty party” is given by Madame De Staël where men dress in rags and women wear tattered gowns that ill conceal their charms. “We must get used to it,” she said and everybody laughed. Soon men in the streets wear red night caps, women appear in night gowns, rich men wear wooden shoes, and young men in gangs of twelve parade the avenues at night carrying heavy clubs, hurrahing for this or that.

Yes, society in Paris was never so gay.

The salons were crowded and politics was the theme. When the discussion waxed too warm someone would start a hymn and all would chime in until the contestants were drowned out and in token of submission joined in the chorus.

But Madame De Staël was very busy

all these days. Her house was filled with refugees, and she ran here and there for passports and pardons, and beseeched ministers and archbishops for interference or assistance or amnesty or succor and all of those things that great men can give or bestow or effect or filch. And when her smiles failed to win the wished-for signature she still had tears that would move a heart of brass.

About this time Baron De Staël fades from our vision, leaving with Madame three children.

“It was never anything but a mariage de convenance anyway, what of it!” and Madame bursts into tears and throws herself into Farquar’s arms.

“Compose yourself, my dear—you are spoiling my gown,” says the Duchesse.

“I stood him as long as I could,” continued Madame.

“You mean he stood you as long as he could.”

“You naughty thing—why don’t you sympathize with me?”

Madame De Staël

Then both women fall into a laughing fit that is interrupted by the servant who announces Benjamin Constant.

Constant came as near winning the love of Madame De Staël as any man ever did. He was politician, scholar, writer, orator, courtier. But with it all he was a boor, for when he had won the favor of Madame De Staël he wrote a long letter to Madame Charriere with whom he had lived for several years in the greatest intimacy, giving reasons why he had forsaken her and ending with an ecstasy in praise of the Staël.

If a man can do a thing more brutal than to humiliate one woman at the expense of another I do not know it. And without entering any defence for the men who love several women at one time, I wish to make a clear distinction between the men who bully and brutalize women for their own gratification and the men who find their highest pleasure in pleasing women. The latter may not be a paragon, yet as his desire is to give pleasure not corral it, he is a totally different being from the man who deceives, badgers, humiliates, and quarrels with one who cannot defend herself, in order that he may find an excuse for leaving her.

A good many of Constant's speeches were written by Madame De Staël and when they travelled together through Germany he no doubt was a great help to her in preparing the De l'Allemagne.

But there was a little man approaching from out the mist of obscurity who was to play an important part in the life of Madame De Staël. He had heard of her wide-reaching influence and such an influence he could not afford to forego—it must be used to further his ends.

Yet the First Consul did not call on her, and she did not call on the First Consul. They played a waiting game. "If he wishes to see me he knows that I am home Thursdays!" she said with a shrug.

"Yes, but a man in his position reverses the usual order, he does not make the first call!"

Madame De Staël

“Evidently!” said Madame, and the subject dropped with a dull thud.

Word came from somewhere that Baron De Staël was severely ill. The wife was thrown into a tumult of emotion. She must go to him at once—a wife’s duty was to her husband first of all. She left everything and, hastening to his bedside, there ministered to him tenderly. But death claimed him.

The widow returned to Paris clothed in deep mourning. Crepe was tied on the door knocker and the salon was closed.

The First Consul sent condolences.

“The First Consul is a joker,” said Dannion solemnly and took snuff.

In six weeks the salon was again opened. Not long after, at a dinner, Napoleon and Madame De Staël sat side by side. “Your father was a great man,” said Napoleon.

He had gotten in the first compliment when she had planned otherwise. She intended to march her charms in a phalanx upon him, but he would not have it so. Her wit fell flat and her prettiest smile only brought the remark, "If the wind veers north it may rain."

They were rivals—that was the trouble; France was not big enough for both.

The Madame's book about Germany had been duly announced, puffed, printed. Ten thousand copies were issued and—seized upon by Napoleon's agents and burned.

"The edition is exhausted," cried Madame as she smiled through her tears and searched for her pocket handkerchief.

The trouble with the book was that nowhere in it was Napoleon mentioned. Had Napoleon never noticed the book the author would have been wofully sorry. As it was she was pleased, and when the last guest had gone she and Benjamin Constant laughed, shook hands, and ordered lunch.

But it was not so funny when Fouché called, apologized, coughed, and said the air in Paris was bad.

Madame De Staël

So Madame De Staël had to go—it was Ten Years of Exile. In that book you can read all about it. She retired to Coppet, and all the griefs, persecutions, disappointments, and heart-aches were doubtless softened by the inward thought of the distinction that was hers in being the first woman banished by Napoleon and of being the only woman he thoroughly feared.

When it came Napoleon's turn to go and the departure for Elba was at hand, it will be remembered he bade good-bye personally to those who had served him so faithfully. It was an affecting scene when he kissed his generals and saluted the swarthy grenadiers in the same way. When told of it Madame picked a petal or two from her bouquet and remarked: "You see, my dears, the difference is this, while Judas kissed but one the Little Man kissed forty. . . ."

Napoleon was scarcely out of France before Madame was back in Paris with all her books and wit and beauty. An ovation was given the daughter of Necker such as Paris alone can give.

But Napoleon did not stay at Elba, at least not according to any accounts I have read.

When word came that he was marching upon Paris, Madame hastily packed up her MSS. and started in hot haste for Coppet.

But when the eighty days had passed and the bugaboo was safely on board the Bellerophon she came back to the scenes she loved so well and to what for her was the only heaven—Paris.

She has been called a philosopher and a literary light. But she was only socio-literary. Her written philosophy does not represent the things she felt were true—simply those things she thought it would be nice to say. She cultivated literature only that she might shine. Love, wealth, health, husband, children—all were sacrificed that she might lead society and win applause. No one ever feared solitude more ; she must have those about her who would minister to her vanity and upon whom she could shower her wit. As a type her life is valuable, and in these pages that traverse the entire circle of feminine virtues and foibles she surely must have a place.

In her last illness she was attended daily by those faithful subjects who had all along recognized her sovereignty—in Society she was Queen. She surely won her heart's desire, for to that bed from which she was no more to rise courtiers came and kneeling kissed her hand and women by the score whom she had befriended paid her the tribute of their tears.

She died in Paris aged fifty-one.

WHEN you are in Switzerland and take the little steamer that plies on Lake Lemman from Lausanne to Geneva, you will see on the western shore a tiny village that clings close around a chateau, like little oysters around the parent shell. This is the village of Coppet that you behold, and the central building that seems to be a part of the very landscape is the Chateau de Necker. This was the home of Madame De Staël and the place where so many refugees sought safety. "Coppet is hell in motion," said Napoleon. "The woman who lives there has a petticoat full of arrows that could hit a man were he seated on a rainbow. She combines in her active head and strong heart Rousseau and Mirabeau; and then shields herself behind a shift and screams if you approach. To attract attention to herself she calls, ' Help, help ! ' ”

The man who voiced these words was surely fit rival to the chatelaine of this vine-covered place of peace that lies smiling an ironical smile in the sunshine on yonder hillside.

Coppet bristles with history.

Could Coppet speak it must tell of Voltaire and Rousseau who had knocked at its gates ; of John Calvin ; of Montmorency ; of Hautville (for whom Victor Hugo named a chateau) ; of Fanny Burney and Madame Récamier and Girardin (pupil of Rousseau) and Lafayette and hosts of others who are to us but names, but who in their day were greatest among all the sons of men.

Chief of all was the great Necker, who himself planned and built the main edifice that his daughter “ might ever call it home.” Little did he know that it would serve as her prison, and that from here she would have to steal away in disguise. But yet it was the place she called home for full two decades. Here she wrote and wept and laughed and sang : hating the place when here, loving it when away. Here she came when De Staël had died, and here she brought her children. Here she received the caresses of Benjamin Constant, and here she won the love of pale, handsome Rocco, and here, "when past age," gave birth to his child. Here and in Paris, in quick turn, the tragedy and comedy of her life were played ; and here she sleeps.

In the tourist season there are many visitors at the chateau. A grave old soldier, wearing on his breast the Cross of the Legion of Honor, meets you at the lodge and conducts you through the halls, the salon, and library. There are many family portraits, and mementos without number, to bring back the past that is gone forever. Inscribed copies of books from Goethe and Schiller and Schlegel and Byron are in the cases, and on the walls are to be seen pictures of

Necker, Rocco, De Staël, and Albert the first-born son, decapitated in a duel by a swinging stroke from a German sabre on account of a king and two aces held in his sleeve.

Beneath the old chateau dances a mountain brook, cold from the Jura ; in the great courtway is a fountain and fish-pond, and all around are flowering plants and stately palms. All is quiet and orderly. No children play, no merry voices call, no glad laughter echoes through these courts. Even the birds have ceased to sing.

The quaint chairs in the parlors are pushed back with precision against the wall, and the funereal silence that reigns supreme seems to say that death yesterday came, and an hour ago all the inmates of the gloomy mansion, save the old soldier, followed the hearse afar and have not yet returned.

We are conducted out through the garden, along gravel walks, across the well-trimmed lawn, and before a high iron gate, walled in on both sides with massive masonry, the old soldier stops, and removes his cap. Standing with heads uncovered, we are told that within rests the dust of Madame De Staël, her parents, her children, and her children's children—four generations in all.

The steamer whistles at the wharf as if to bring us back from dreams and mould and death, and we hasten away, walking needlessly fast, looking back furtively to see if grim spectral shapes are following after. None are seen, but we do not breathe freely until aboard the steamer and two short whistles are heard, and the order is given to cast off.

We push off slowly from the stone pier, and all is safe.

THE Mennonite, Dunkard, Shaker, Oneida Communist, Mormon, and Quaker are all one people, varying only according to environment. They are all Come-outers.

They turn to plain clothes, hard work, religious thought, eschewing the pomps and vanities of the world,—all for the same reasons. Scratch anyone of them and you will find the true type. The monk of the Middle Ages was the same man; his peculiarity being an extreme asceticism that caused him to count sex a mistake on the part of God. And this same question has been a stumbling-block for ages to the type we now have under the glass. A man who gives the question of sex too much attention is very apt

Elizabeth Fry

either to have no wife at all or else four or five. If a Franciscan friar of the olden time happened to glance at a clothes line on which, gaily waving in the wanton winds, was a smock frock, he wore peas in his sandals for a month and a day.

The Shaker does not count women out because the founder of the sect was a woman, but he is a complete celibate and depends on Gentiles to populate the earth. The Dunkard quotes St. Paul and marries because he must, but regards romantic love as a thing of which Deity is jealous, and also a bit ashamed. The Oneida Community clung to the same thought, and to obliterate selfishness held women in common, tracing pedigree after the manner of ancient Sparta, through the female line, because there was no other way. The Mormon incidentally and accidentally adopted polygamy.

The Quakers have for the best part looked with disfavor on passionate love. In the worship of Deity they separate women from men. But all oscillations are equalized by swingings to the other side. The Quakers have often discarded a distinctive marriage ceremony, thus slanting toward natural selection. And I might tell you of how in one of the South American states there is a band of Friends who have discarded the rite entirely, making marriage a private and personal contract between the man and woman—a sacred matter of conscience; and should the man and woman find after a trial that their mating was a mistake they are as free to separate as they were to marry, and no obloquy is attached in any event. Harriet Martineau, Quaker in sympathy, although not in name, being an independent fighter armed with a long squirrel rifle of marvellous range and accuracy, pleaded strongly and boldly for a law that would make divorce as free and simple as marriage. Harriet once called marriage a mouse-trap, and thereby sent shivers of surprise and indignation up a bishop's back.

Elizabeth Fry

But there is one thing among all these quasi-ascetic sects that has ever been in advance of the great mass of humanity from which they are detached parts : they have given woman her rights, whereas, the mass has always prated, and does yet, mentioning it in statute law, that the male has certain natural "rights," and the women only such rights as are granted her by the males. And the reason of this wrong-headed attitude on part of the mob is plain. It rules by force, whereas the semi-ascetic sects decry force, using only moral suasion, falling back on the Christ doctrine of non-resistance. This has given their women a chance to prove that they have just as able minds as men, if not better.

That these non-resistants are the salt of the earth none who know them can deny. It was the residents of the monasteries in the Middle Ages who kept learning and art from dying off the face of Europe. They built such churches and performed such splendid work in art that we are hushed into silence before the dignity of the ruins of Melrose, Dryburgh, and Furness. There are no paupers among the Quakers, a "criminal class" is a thing no Mennonite understands, no Dunkard is a drunkard, the Oneida Communists were all well educated and in dollars passing rich, while the Mormons have accumulated wealth at the rate of over eleven hundred dollars a man per year which is more than three times as good a record as can be shown by New York or Pennsylvania. And further: until the Gentiles bore down upon her, Utah had no use for either prisons, asylums, or almshouses. Until the Gentiles crowded into Salt Lake City there was no "tenderloin district," no "dangerous class," no gambling "dives." Instead, there was universal order, industry, sobriety. It is well to recognize the fact that the quasi-ascetic, possessed of a religious idea, persecuted to a point that holds him to his work, is the best type of citizen the world has ever known. Tobacco, strong drink, and opium alternately lull and excite, soothe and elevate, but always destroy ; yet they do not destroy our ascetic for he knows them not. He does not deplete himself by drugs, rivalry, strife, or anger. He believes in co-operation not competition. He works and prays. He keeps a good digestion, an even pulse, a clear conscience ; and as man's true wants are very few, our subject grows rich and has not only ample supplies for himself but is enabled to minister to others. He is earth's good Samaritan. It was Tolstoi and his daughter who started soup-houses in Russia and kept famine at bay. Your true monk never passed by on the other side ; ah no ! the business of the old-time priest was to do good. The Quaker is his best descendant—he is the true philanthropist.

If jeered and hooted and finally oppressed, these protesters will form a clan or sect and adopt a distinctive garb and speech. If persecuted, they will hold together, as cattle on the prairies huddle against the storm. But if left alone the Law of Reversion to Type catches the second generation, and the young men and maidens secrete millinery, just as birds do a brilliant plumage, and the strange sect merges into and is lost in the mass. The Jews did not say, Go to, we will be peculiar, but, as Mr. Zangwill has stated, they have remained a peculiar people simply because they have been proscribed.

The successful monk, grown rich and feeling secure, turns voluptuary and becomes the very thing that he renounced in his monastic vows. Over-anxious bicyclists run into the object they wish to avoid. We are attracted to the thing we despise ; and we despise it because it attracts. A recognition of this principle will make plain why so many temperance fanatics are really drunkards trying hard to keep sober. In us all is the germ of the thing we hate ; we become like the thing we hate ; we are the thing we hate. Ex-Quakers in Philadelphia, I am told, are very dressy people. But before a woman becomes a genuine admitted non-Quaker, the rough gray woollen dress shades off by almost imperceptible degrees into a dainty silken lilac, whose generous folds have a most peculiar and seductive rustle; the bonnet becomes smaller, and pertly assumes a becoming ruche, from under which steal forth daring winsome ringlets, while at the neck, purest of cream-white kerchiefs jealously conceal the charms that a mere worldly woman might reveal. Then the demimonde, finding themselves neglected, bribe the dressmakers and adopt the costume.

Thus does civilization, like the cyclone, move in spirals.

IN a sermon preached at the City Temple, June 18, 1896, Doctor Joseph Parker said: "There it was—there! at Smithfield Market, a stone's throw from here, that Ridley and Latimer were burned. Over this spot the smoke of martyr fires hovered. And I pray for a time when they will hover again. Aye, that is what we need! the rack, the gallows, chains, dungeons, fagots!"

Yes, those are his words, and it was two days before it came to me that Dr. Parker knew just what he was talking about. Persecution cannot stamp out virtue any more than man's effort can obliterate matter. Man changes the form of things but he does not cancel their essence. And this is as true of the unseen attributes of spirit as it is of the elements of matter. Did the truths taught by Latimer and Ridley go out with the flames that crackled about their limbs? and were their names written for the last time in smoke? 'T were vain to ask. The bishop, who instigated their persecution, gave them certificates for immortality. But the bishop did not know it—bishops who persecute know not what they do.

Let us guess the result if Jesus had been eminently successful, gathering about him, with the years, the strong and influential men of Jerusalem! Suppose he had fallen asleep at last of old age, and, full of honors, been carried to his own tomb patterned after that of Joseph of Arimathea, but richer far—what then! And if Socrates had apologized and had not drunk of the hemlock, how about his philosophy? and would Plato have written the Phædo?

No religion is pure except in its state of poverty and persecution; the good things of earth are our corrupters. All life is from the sun, but fruit too well loved of the sun falls first and rots. The religion that is fostered by the state and upheld by a standing army may be a pretty good religion, but it is not the Christ religion, call you it "Christianity" never so loudly.

Martyr and persecutor are usually cut off the same piece. They are the same type of man ; and looking down the centuries they seem to have shifted places easily. As to which is persecutor and which is martyr is only a question of transient power. They are constantly teaching the trick to each other, just as scolding parents have saucy children. They are both good people ; their sincerity cannot be doubted. Marcus Aurelius, the best emperor Rome ever had, persecuted the Christians ; while Caligula, Rome's worst emperor, didn't know there were any Christians in his dominion, and if he had known would not have cared.

The persecutor and martyr both belong to the cultus known as "Muscular Christianity," the distinguishing feature of which is a final appeal to force. We should respect it for the frankness of the name in which it delights—Muscular Christianity being a totally different thing from Christianity, which smitten turns the other cheek.

But the Quaker, best type of the non-resistant quasi-ascetic, is the exception that proves the rule ; he may be persecuted, but he persecutes not again. He is the best authenticated type living of primitive Christian. That the religion of Jesus was a purely reactionary movement, suggested by the smug complacency and voluptuous condition of the times, most thinking men agree. Where rich Pharisees adopt a standard of life that can only be maintained by devouring widows' houses and oppressing the orphan, the needs of the hour bring to the front a man who will swing the pendulum to the other side. When society plays tennis with truth, and pitch and toss with all the expressions of love and friendship, certain ones will confine their speech to yea, yea, and nay, nay. When men utter loud prayers on street corners, someone will suggest that the better way to pray is to retire to your closet and shut the door. When self appointed rulers wear purple and scarlet and make broad their phylacteries, someone will suggest that honest men had better adopt a simplicity of attire. When a whole nation grows mad in its hot endeavor to become rich and the Temple of the Most High is cumbered by the seats of money changers, already in some Galilean village sits a youth, conscious of his Divine kinship, plaiting a scourge of cords.

The gray garb of the Quaker is only a revulsion from a flutter of ribbons and a towering headgear of hues that shame the lily and rival the rainbow. Beau Brummel, lifting his hat with great flourish to nobility and standing hatless in the presence of illustrious nobodies, finds his counterpart in William Penn, who was born with his hat on and uncovers to no one. The height of Brummel's hat finds place in the width of Penn's.

Quakerism is a protest against an idle, vain, voluptuous, and selfish life. It is the natural recoil from insincerity, vanity, and gormandism which, growing glaringly offensive, causes these certain men and women to "come-out" and stand firm for plain living and high thinking. And were it not for this divine principle in humanity that prompts individuals to separate from the mass when sensuality threatens to hold supreme sway, the race would be snuffed out in hopeless night. These men who come out effect their mission, not by making all men Come-outers, but by imperceptibly changing the complexion of the mass. They are the true and literal Saviours of mankind.

NORWICH has several things to recommend it to the tourist, chief of which is the cathedral. Great, massive, sullen structure—begun in the Eleventh Century—it adheres more closely to its Norman type than any other building in England.

Within sound of the tolling bells of this great cathedral, aye, almost within the shadow of its turrets, was born, in 1780, Elizabeth Gurney. Her line of ancestry traced directly back to the de Gournays who came with William the Conqueror, and laid the foundations of this church and England's civilization. To the sensitive, imaginative girl this sacred temple, replete with history, fading off into storied song and curious legend, meant much. She haunted its solemn transepts, and followed with eager eyes the carved bosses on the ceiling, to see if the cherubs pictured there were really alive. She took children from the street and conducted them thither, explaining that it was her grandfather who laid the mortar between the stones and reared the walls and placed the splendid colored windows, on which reflections of real angels were to be seen and where Madonnas winked when the wind was east. And the children listened with open mouths and marvelled much, and this encouraged the pale little girl with the wondering eyes, and she led them to the tomb of Sir William Boleyn, whose granddaughter, Anne Boleyn, used often to come here and garland with flowers the grave above which our toddlers talked in whispers, and where, yesterday, I too stood.

Elizabeth Fry

And so Elizabeth grew in years and in stature and in understanding; and although her parents were not members of the Established Religion, yet a great cathedral is greater than sect, and to her it was the true House of Prayer. It was there that God listened to the prayers of His children. She loved the place with an idolatrous love and with all the splendid superstition of a child, and thither she went to kneel and ask fulfilment of her heart's desire. All the beauties of ancient and innocent days moved radiant and luminous in the azure of her mind. But time crept on and a woman's penetrating comprehension came to her, and the dreams of youth shifted off into the realities of maturity, and she saw that many who came to pray were careless, frivolous people, and that the vergers did their work without more reverence than did the stablemen who cared for her father's horses. And once when twilight was veiling the choir, and all of the worshippers had departed, she saw a curate strike a match on the cloister wall, to light his pipe, and then with the rector laugh loudly, because the bishop had forgotten and read his Te Deum Laudamus before his Gloria in Excelsis.

By degrees it came to her that the lord bishop of this holy place was in the employ of the state, and that the state was master too of the army and the police and the ships that sailed away to New Zealand, carrying in their holds women and children, who never came back, and men who, like the lord bishop, had forgotten this and done that when they should have done the other.

Once in the streets of Norwich she saw a dozen men with fetters rivetted to their legs, all fastened to one clanking chain, breaking stone in the drizzle of a winter rain. And the thought came to her that the rich ladies, wrapped in furs, who rolled by in their carriages, going to the cathedral to pray, were no more God's children than these wretches breaking stone from the darkness of a winter morning until darkness settled over the earth again at night.

She saw plainly the patent truth that if some people wore gaudy and costly raiment, others must dress in rags ; if some ate and drank more than they needed, and wasted the good things of earth, others must go hungry ; if some never worked with their hands, others must needs toil continuously.

The Gurneys were nominally Friends, but they had gradually slipped away from the directness of speech, the plainness of dress, and the simplicity of the Quakers. They were getting rich on government contracts—and who wants to be ridiculous anyway? So, with consternation, the father and mother heard the avowal of Elizabeth to adopt the extreme customs of the Friends. They sought to dissuade her. They pointed out the uselessness of being singular, and the folly of adopting a mode of life that makes you a laughing-stock. But this eighteen-year-old girl stood firm. She had resolved to live the Christ-life and devote her energies to lessening the pains of earth. Life was too short for frivolity ; no one could afford to compromise with evil. She became the friend of children ; the champion of the unfortunate ; she sided with the weak ; she was their friend and comforter. Her life became a cry in favor of the oppressed, a defence of the down-trodden, an exaltation of self-devotion, a prayer for universal sympathy, liberty, and light. She pleaded for the vicious, recognizing that all are sinners and that those who do unlawful acts are no more sinners in the eyes of God than we who think them.

The religious nature and sex-life are closely akin. The woman possessing a high religious fervor is also capable of a great and passionate love. But the Norwich Friends did not believe in a passionate love, excepting as the work of the devil. Yet this they knew, that marriage tames a woman as nothing else can. They believed in religion of course, but not an absorbing, fanatical religion ! Elizabeth should get married—it would cure her mental maladies : exaltation of spirit in a girl is a dangerous thing anyway. Nothing subdues like marriage.

Elizabeth Fry

It may not be generally known, but your religious ascetic is a great match-maker. In all religious communities, especially rural communities, men who need wives need not advertise—there are self-appointed committees of old ladies who advise and look after such matters closely. The immanence of sex becomes vicarious, and that which once dwelt in the flesh is now a thought: like men-about-town, whose vices finally become simply mental, so do these old ladies carry on courtships by power of attorney.

And so the old ladies found a worthy Quaker man who would make a good husband for Elizabeth. The man was willing. He wrote a letter to her from his home in London, addressing it to her father. The letter was brief and business-like. It described himself in modest but accurate terms. He weighed ten stone and was five feet eight inches high; he was a merchant with a goodly income; and in disposition was all that was to be desired—at least he said so. His pedigree was standard.

The Gurneys looked up this Mr. Fry, merchant of London, and found all as stated. He checked O. K. He was invited to visit at Norwich ; he came, he saw, and was conquered. He liked Elizabeth, and Elizabeth liked him—she surely did or she would never have married him.

Elizabeth bore him twelve children. Mr. Fry was certainly an excellent and amiable man. I find it recorded, “he never in any way hampered his wife’s philanthropic work,” and with this testimonial to the excellence of Mr. Fry’s character we will excuse him from these pages and speak only of his wife.

Contrary to expectations, Elizabeth was not tamed by marriage. She looked after her household with diligence ; but instead of confining her “social duties” to following hotly after those in station above her, she sought out those in the stratum beneath. Soon after reaching London she began taking long walks alone, watching the people, especially the beggars. The lowly and the wretched interested her. She saw, girl though she was, that beggardom and vice were twins.

Elizabeth Fry

In one of her daily walks, she noticed on a certain corner a frowsled woman holding a babe, and thrusting out a grimy hand for alms, telling a woful tale of a dead soldier husband to each passer by. Elizabeth stopped and talked with the woman. As the day was cold, she took off her mittens and gave them to the beggar, and went her way. The next day she again saw the woman on the same corner and again talked with her, asking to see the baby held so closely within the tattered shawl. An intuitive glance (mother herself or soon to be) told her that this sickly babe was not the child of the woman who held it. She asked questions that the woman evaded. Pressed further, the beggar grew abusive, and took refuge in curses, with dire threats of violence. Mrs. Fry withdrew, and waiting for nightfall followed the woman : down a winding alley, past rows of rotting tenements, into a cellar below a gin-shop. There, in this one squalid room, she found a dozen babies, all tied fast in cribs or chairs, starving, or dying of inattention. The woman, taken by surprise, did not grow violent this time : she fled, and Mrs. Fry, sending for two women Friends, took charge of the sufferers.

This sub-cellar nursery opened the eyes of Mrs. Fry to the grim fact that England, professing to be Christian, building costly churches, and maintaining an immense army of paid priests, was essentially barbaric. She set herself to the task of doing what she could while life lasted to lessen the horror of ignorance and sin.

Newgate Prison then as now stood in the centre of the city. It was necessary to have it in a conspicuous place so that all might see the result of wrong doing and be good. Along the front of the prison were strong iron gratings where the prisoners crowded up to talk with their friends. Through these gratings the unhappy wretches called to strangers for alms, and thrust out long wooden spoons for contributions, that would enable them to pay their fines. There was a woman's department, but if the men's department was too full men and women were herded together.

Mrs. Fry worked for her sex, so of these I will speak. Women who had children under seven years of age took them to prison with them; every week babes were born there, so at one time in the year 1826 we find there were one hundred and ninety women and one hundred children in Newgate. There was no bedding. No clothing was supplied, and those who had no friends outside to supply them clothing were naked or nearly so, and would have been entirely were it not for that spark of divinity that causes the most depraved of women to minister to each other. Women hate only their successful rivals. The lowest of women will assist each other when there is a dire emergency.

In this pen, awaiting trial, execution, or transportation, were girls of twelve to senile, helpless creatures of eighty. All were thrust together. Hardened criminals, besotted prostitutes, maid-servants accused of stealing thimbles, married women suspected of blasphemy, pure-hearted, brave-natured girls who had run away from brutal parents or more brutal husbands, insane persons,—all were herded together. All of the keepers were men. Patrolling the walls were armed guards who were ordered to shoot all who tried to escape. These guards were usually on good terms with the women prisoners—hobnobbing at will. When the mailed hand of government had once thrust these women behind iron bars, and relieved virtuous society of their presence, it seemed to think it had done its duty. Inside, no crime was recognized save murder. These women fought, overpowered the weak, stole from and maltreated each other. Sometimes certain ones would combine for self-defence, forming factions. Once the governor of the prison, bewigged, powdered, lace-befrilled, ventured pompously into the woman's department without his usual armed guard; fifty hags set upon him. In a twinkling his clothing was torn to shreds too small for carpet rags, and in two minutes by the sand-glass, when he got back to the bars, lustily calling for help, he was as naked as a cherub, even if not so innocent.

Visitors who ventured near to the grating were often asked to shake hands, and if once a grip was gotten upon them the man was drawn up close, while long sinewy fingers grabbed his watch, handkerchief, neck-scarf, or hat—all was pulled into the den. Sharp nail-marks on the poor fellow's face told of the scrimmage, and all the time the guards on the walls and the spectators roared with laughter. Oh, it was awfully funny!

One woman whose shawl was snatched

and sucked into the maelstrom complained to the police, and was told that folks inside of Newgate could not be arrested, and that a good motto for outsiders was to keep away from dangerous places.

Every morning at nine a curate read prayers at the prisoners. The curate stood well outside the grating; while all the time from inside loud cries of advice were given and sundry remarks tendered him concerning his personal appearance. The frightful hilarity of the mob saved these wretches from despair. But the curate did his duty: he who has ears to hear let him hear.

Waiting in the harbor were ships loading their freight of sin, crime, and woe for Botany Bay; at Tyburn every week women were hanged. Three hundred offences were punishable by death; but, as in the West, where horse-stealing is the supreme offence, most of the hangings were for smuggling, forgery, or shop-lifting. England being a nation of shop-keepers could not forgive offences that might injure a haberdasher.

Little Mrs. Fry, in the plainest of Quaker gray dress, with bonnet to match, stood outside of Newgate and heard the curate read prayers. She resolved to ask the governor of the prison if she might herself perform the office. The governor was polite, but stated there was no precedent for such an important move—he must have time to consider. Mrs. Fry called again, and permission was granted, with strict orders that she must not attempt to proselyte, and further, she better not get too near the grating.

Mrs. Fry gave the great man a bit of fright by quietly explaining thus: “Sir, if thee kindly allows me to pray with the women I will go inside.”

The governor asked her to say it again. She did so, and a bright thought came to the great man: he would grant her request, writing an order that she be allowed to go inside the prison whenever she desired. It would teach her a lesson and save him from further importunity.

So little Mrs. Fry presented the order and the gates were swung open, and the iron quickly snapped behind her. She spoke to the women, addressing the one who seemed to be leader as sister, and asked the others to follow her back into the courtway away from the sound of the street, so they could have prayers. They followed dumbly. She knelt on the stone pavement and prayed in silence. Then she arose and read to them the 107th Psalm. Again she prayed, asking the others to kneel with her. A dozen knelt. She arose and went her way amid a hush of solemn silence.

Next day, when she came again, the ribaldry ceased on her approach, and after the religious service she remained inside the walls an hour conversing with those who wished to talk with her, going to all the children that were sick and ministering to them.

In a week she called all together and proposed starting a school for the children. The mothers entered into the project gladly. A governess, imprisoned for theft, was elected teacher. A cell-room was cleaned out, whitewashed, and set apart for a school-room, with the permission of the governor, who granted the request, explaining, however, that there was no precedent for such a thing. The school prospered, and outside the school-room door hungry-eyed women listened furtively for scraps of knowledge that might be tossed overboard.

Mrs. Fry next organized classes for these older children, gray-haired, bowed with sin—many of them. There were twelve in each class, and they elected a monitor from their numbers, agreeing to obey her. Mrs. Fry brought cloth from her husband's store, and the women were taught to sew. The Governor insisted that there was no precedent for it, and the guards on the walls said that every scrap of cloth would be stolen, but the guards were wrong.

Elizabeth Fry

The day was divided up into regular hours for work and recreation. Other good Quaker women from outside came in to help; and the tap-room kept by a mercenary guard was done away with, and an order established that no spirituous liquors should be brought into Newgate. The women agreed to keep away from the grating on the street, except when personal friends came; to cease begging; to quit gambling. They were given pay for their labor. A woman was asked for as turnkey, instead of a man. All guards were to be taken from the walls that overlooked the women's department. The women were to be given mats to sleep on, and blankets to cover them when the weather was cold. The governor was astonished! He called a council of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. They visited the prison, and found for the first time that order had come out of chaos at Newgate.

Mrs. Fry's requests were granted, and

this little woman awoke one morning to find herself famous.

From Newgate she turned her attention to other prisons ; she travelled throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland visiting prisons and asylums. She became well feared by those in authority, for her firm and gentle glance went straight to every abuse. Often she was airily turned away by some official clothed in a little brief authority, but the man usually lived to know his mistake.

She was invited by the French Government to visit the prisons of Paris and write a report, giving suggestions as to what reforms should be made. She went to Belgium, Holland, and Germany, being received by kings and queens and prime-ministers—as costume, her plain gray dress always sufficing. She treated royalty and unfortunates alike—simply as equals. She kept constantly in her mind the thought that all men are sinners before God: there are no rich, no poor ; no high, no low ; no bond, no free. Conditions are transient, and boldly did she say to the King of France that he should build prisons with the idea of reformation, not revenge, and with the thought ever before him that he himself or his children might occupy these cells—so vain are human ambitions. To Sir Robert Peel and his cabinet she read the story concerning the gallows built by Haman. "You must not shut out the sky from the prisoner; you must build no dark cells—your children may occupy them," she said.

John Howard and others had sent a glimmering ray of truth through the fog of ignorance concerning insanity. The belief was growing that insane people were really not possessed of devils after all. Yet still, the cell system, strait-jacket, and hand-cuffs were in great demand. In no asylum were prisoners allowed to eat at tables. Food was given to each in tin-basins, without spoons, knives, or forks. Glass-dishes and china plates were considered especially danger ous , they told of one man who in an insane fit had cut his throat with a plate, and another who had swallowed a spoon.

Elizabeth Fry

Visiting an asylum at Worcester, Mrs. Fry saw the inmates receive their tin dishes, and, crouched on the floor, eating like wild beasts. She asked the chief warden for permission to try an experiment. He dubiously granted it. With the help of several of the inmates she arranged a long table, covered it with spotless linen brought by herself, placed bouquets of wild flowers on the table, and set it as she did at her own home. Then she invited twenty of the patients to dinner. They came, and a clergyman, who was an inmate, was asked to say grace. All sat down, and the dinner passed off as quietly and pleasantly as could be wished.

And these were the reforms she strove for, and put into practical execution everywhere. She asked that the word asylum be dropped, and home or hospital used instead. In visiting asylums, by her presence she said to the troubled spirits, Peace, be still! For half a century she toiled with an increasing energy and a never-flagging animation. She passed out full of honors, beloved as woman was never yet loved—loved by the unfortunate, the deformed, the weak, the vicious. She worked for a present good, here and now, believing that we can reach the future only through the present. In penology nothing has been added to her philosophy, and we have as yet not nearly carried out her suggestions.

Elizabeth Fry

Generations will come and go, nations will rise, grow old, and die, kings and rulers will be forgotten, but by so long as love kisses the white lips of pain will men remember the name of Elizabeth Fry, Friend of Humanity.

MARY LAMB

Her education in youth was not much attended to, and she happily missed all the train of female garniture which passeth by the name of accomplishments. She was tumbled early, by accident or providence, into a spacious closet of good old English reading, without much selection or prohibition, and browsed at will upon that fair and wholesome pasturage. Had I twenty girls they should be brought up exactly in this fashion. I know not whether their chance in wedlock might not be diminished by it, but I can answer for it that it maketh (if worst comes to worst) most incomparable old maids.

I.

I SING the love of brother and sister. For he who tells the tale of Charles and Mary Lamb's life must tell of a love that was an uplift to this brother and sister in childhood, that sustained them in the desolation of disaster, and was a saving solace even when every hope seemed gone and reason veiled her face. This love caused the flowers of spring-time to bloom for them again and again, and attracted such a circle of admirers, that as we read the records of their lives, set forth in the letters they received and wrote, we forget poverty, forget calamity, and behold only the radiant, smiling faces of loving, trusting, trustful friends.

Mary Lamb

The mother of Charles and Mary Lamb was a woman of fine natural endowment, of spirit, and aspiration. She married a man much older than herself. We know but little about John Lamb; we know little of his habits, less of his ambitions, nothing of his ancestry. Neither do we care to. He was not good enough to attract, nor bad enough to be interesting. He called himself a scrivener, but in fact he was a valet. He was neutral salts; and I say this just after having read his son's amiable mention of him under the guise of "Lovel," and with full knowledge that "he danced well, was a good judge of vintage, played the harpsichord, and recited poetry on occasion."

When a woman of spirit stands up before a priest and makes solemn promise to live with a man who plays the harpsichord and is a good judge of vintage, and to love him until either he or she dies, she sows the seeds of death and disorder. Of course, I know that men and women who make promises before priests know not at the time what they do ; they find out afterwards.

Mary Lamb

And so they were married—were John Lamb and Elizabeth Field ; and probably very soon thereafter Elizabeth had a premonition that this union only held in store a glittering blade of steel for her heart. For she grew ill and dispirited, and John found companionship at the ale-house, and came stumbling home asking what the devil was the reason his wife could n't meet him with a smile and a kiss and a' that, as a dutiful wife should !

Elizabeth began to live more and more within herself.

We often hear foolish men taunt women with inability to keep secrets. But women who talk much often do keep secrets—there are nooks in their hearts where the sun never enters, and where those nearest them are never allowed to look. More lives are blasted by secrecy than frankness—ay ! a thousand times. Why should such a thing as a secret ever exist ? 'T is preposterous, and is proof positive of depravity. If you and I are to live together, my life must be open as the ether and all my thoughts be yours. If I keep back this and that, you will find it out some day and suspect, with reason, that I also keep back the other. Ananias and Sapphira met death, not so much for simple untruthfulness as for keeping something back.

Elizabeth Lamb sought to protect herself against an unappreciative mate by secrecy (perhaps she had to), and the habit grew until she kept secrets as a business,—she kept foolish little secrets. Did she get a letter from her aunt, she read it in suggestive silence and then put it in her pocket. If visitors called she never mentioned it, and when the children heard of it weeks afterward they marvelled.

And so shy little Mary Lamb wondered what is was her mother kept locked up in the bottom drawer of the bureau, and Mary was told that children must not ask questions—little girls should be seen and not heard.

At night Mary would dream of the things that were in that drawer, and sometimes great big black things would creep out through the keyhole and grow bigger and bigger until they filled the room so full that you could n't breathe, and then little Mary would cry aloud and scream, and her father would come with a strap that was kept on a nail behind the kitchen door and teach her better than to wake everybody up in the middle of the night.

Yet Mary loved her mother and sought in many ways to meet her wishes, and all the time her mother kept the bureau draw locked, and away somewhere on a high shelf were hidden all tenderness—all the gentle loving words and the caresses which children crave.

And little Mary's life seemed full of troubles, and the world a grievous place where everybody misunderstands everybody else ; and at night-time she would often hide her face in the pillow and cry herself to sleep.

But when she was ten years of age a great joy came into her life—a baby brother came! And all the love in the little girl's heart was poured out for the puny baby boy. Babies are troublesome things, anyway, where folks are awful poor and where there are no servants and the mother is not so very strong. And so Mary became the baby's own little foster-mother, and she carried him about, and long before he could lisp a word she had told him all the hopes and secrets of her heart, and he cooed and laughed, and lying on the floor, kicked his heels in the air and treated hope and love and ambition alike.

I cannot find that Mary ever went to school. She stayed at home and sewed, did housework, and took care of the baby. All her learning came by absorption. When the boy was three years old she taught him his letters, and did it so deftly and well that he used to declare he could always read—and this is as it should be. When seven years of age the boy was sent to the Blue-Coat School. This was brought about through the influence of Mr. Salt, for whom John Lamb worked. Mr. Salt was a Bencher, and be it known a Bencher in England is not exactly the same thing as a Bencher in America. Mr. Salt took quite a notion to little Mary Lamb, and once when she came to his office with her father's dinner, the honorable Bencher chucked her under the chin, said she was a fine little girl, and asked her if she liked to read. And when she answered, "Oh, yes, sir!" and then added "If you please!" the Bencher laughed, and told her she was welcome to take any book in his library. And so we find she spent many happy hours in the great man's library; and it was through her importunities that Mr. Salt got banty Charles the scholarship in Christ's Hospital School.

Now the Blue-Coat boys are a curiosity to every sight-seer in London—and have been for these hundred years and more. Their long-tailed blue coats, buckle shoes, and absence of either hats or caps bring the Yankee up with a halt. To conduct an American around to the vicinity of Christ's Hospital and let him discover a "Blue-Coat" for himself is a sensation. The costume is exactly the same as that worn by Edward, "the Boy King," who founded the school, and these youngsters, like the birds, never grow old. You lean against the high iron fence, and looking through the bars watch the boys frolic and play just as visitors looked in the eighteenth century; and I've never been by Christ's Hospital yet when curious people did not stand and stare. And one thing the Blue-Coats seem to prove, and that is that hats are quite superfluous.

One worthy man from Jamestown, New York, was so impressed by these hatless boys that he wrote a book proving that the wearing of hats was what has kept the race in bondage to ignorance all down the ages. By statistics he proved that the Blue-Coats had attained distinction quite out of ratio to their number, and cited Coleridge, Leigh Hunt, Charles Lamb, and many others as proof. This man returned to Jamestown hatless and had he not caught cold and been carried off by pneunouia would have spread his hatless gospel, rendering the name of Knox the Hatter infamous, and causing the word "Derby" to be henceforth a by-word and a hissing.

When little Charles Lamb tucked the tails of his long blue coat under his belt and played leap-frog in the school yard every morning at ten minutes after 'leven, his sister, wan, yellow, and dreamy, used to come and watch him through these self-same iron bars. She would wave the corner of her rusty shawl in loving token and he would answer back and would have lifted his hat if he had had one. When the bell rang and the boys went pell-mell into the entry-way Charles would linger and hold one hand above his head as the stone wall swallowed him, and the sister knowing that all was well would hasten back to her work in Little Queen Street, hard by, to wait for the morrow when she could come again.

“Who is that girl always hanging ’round after you?” asked a tall, handsome boy, called Ajax, of little Charles Lamb.

“Wh’ why, don’t you know—that, wh’ why that ’s my sister Mary!”

“How should I know when you have never introduced me!” loftily replied Ajax.

And so the next day at ten minutes after ’leven Charles and the mighty Ajax came down to the fence and Charles had to call to Mary not to run away, and Charles introduced Ajax to Mary and they shook hands through the fence. And the next week Ajax, who was known in private life as Samuel Taylor Coleridge, called at the house in Little Queen Street where the Lambs lived, and they all had gin and water, and the elder Lamb played the harpsichord, a second-hand one that had been presented by Mr. Salt, and recited poetry, and Coleridge talked the elder Lamb under the table and argued the entire party into silence. Coleridge was only seventeen then but a man grown and already took snuff like a courtier, tapping the lid of the box meditatively and flashing a conundrum the while on the admiring company.

Mary kept about as close run of the Blue-Coat School as if she had been a Blue-Coat herself. Still she felt it her duty to keep one lesson in advance of her brother just to know that he was progressing well.

He continued to go to school until he was fourteen, when he was set to work in the South Sea Company's office, because his income was needed to keep the family. Mary was educating the boy with the help of Mr. Salt's library, for a boy as fine as Charles must be educated, you know. By and by the bubble burst and young Lamb was transferred to the East India Company's office and being promoted was making nearly a hundred pounds a year.

And Mary sewed and borrowed books and toiled incessantly, but was ill at times. People said her head was not just right—she was overworked and nervous or something! The father had lost his place on account of too much gin and water—especially gin; the mother was almost helpless from paralysis, and in the family was an aged maiden aunt to be cared for. The only regular income was the salary of Charles. There they lived in their poverty and lowliness, hoping for better things!

Charles was working away over the ledgers and used to come home fagged and weary and Coleridge was far away, and there was no boy to educate now and only sick and foolish and quibbling people on whom to strike fire. The dem-nition grind did its work for Mary Lamb as surely as it is to-day doing for countless farmer's wives in Iowa and Illinois.

Thus ran the years away.

Mary Lamb

---

Mary Lamb, aged thirty-two, gentle, intelligent, and wondrous kind, in sudden frenzy seized a knife from the table and with one thrust sank the blade into her mother's heart. Charles Lamb, in an adjoining room, hearing the commotion, entered quickly and taking the knife from his sister's hand, put his arm about her and tenderly led her away.

Returning in a few moments, the mother was dead.

Women often make shrill outcry at sight of a mouse ; men curse roundly when large, buzzing, blue-bottle flies disturb their after-dinner nap ; but let occasion come and the stuff of which heroes are made is in us all. I think well of my kind.

Charles Lamb made no outcry, he shed no tears, he spoke no word of reproach. He met each detail of that terrible issue as coolly, calmly, and surely as if he had been making entries in his journal. No man ever loved his mother more, but she was dead now—she was dead. He closed the staring eyes, composed the stiffening limbs, kept curious sight-seers at bay, and all the time thought of what he could do to protect the living—she who had wrought this ruin.

Charles was twenty-one—a boy in feeling and temperament, a frolicsome, heedless boy. In an hour he had become a man.

It requires a subtler pen than mine to trace the psychology of this tragedy ; but let me say thus much, it had its birth in love, in unrequited love ; and the outcome of it was an increase of love.

O God ! how wonderful are thy works ! Thou makest the rotting log to nourish banks of violets, and from the stagnant pool at thy word springs forth the lotus that covers all with fragrance and beauty !

II.

COLERIDGE in his youth was brilliant, no one disputes that. He dazzled Charles and Mary Lamb from the very first. Even when a Blue-Coat he could turn a pretty quatrain, and when he went away to Cambridge and once in a long while wrote a letter down to "My Own C. L." it was a feast for the sister too. Mary was different from other girls, she did n't "have company," she was too honest and serious and earnest for society—her ideals too high. Coleridge, handsome, witty, philosophic Coleridge was her ideal. She loved him from afar.

How vain it is to ponder in our minds the what-might-have-been! Yet how can we help wondering what would have been the result had Coleridge wedded Mary Lamb! In many ways it seems it would have been an ideal mating, for Mary Lamb's mental dowry made good Coleridge's every deficiency, and his merits equalized all that she lacked. He was sprightly, head-strong, erratic, emotional; she was equally keen-witted, but a conservative in her cast of mind. That she was capable of a great and passionate love there is no doubt, and he might have been. Mary Lamb would have been his anchor to win'ard, but as it was he drifted straight onto the rocks. Her mental troubles came from a lack of responsibility—a rusting away of unused powers in a dull, monotonous round of commonplace. Had her heart found its home I cannot conceive of her in any other light than as a splendid earnest woman—sane, well-poised, and doing a work that only the strong can do. Coleridge has left on record the statement that she was the only woman he ever met who had a “logical mind.” That is to say, the only woman who ever understood him when he talked his best.

Charles Lamb,
Mary Anne Lamb,

Mary Lamb

---

Coleridge made progress at the Blue-Coat School : he became "Deputy Grecian," or head scholar. This secured him a scholarship at Cambridge and thither he went in search of honors. But his revolutionary and Unitarian principles did not serve him in good stead and he was placed under the ban.

At the same time a youth by the name of Robert Southey was having a like experience at Oxford. Other youths had tried in days ago to shake Cambridge and Oxford out of their conservatism, and the result was that the embryo revolutionists speedily found themselves warned off the campus. So through sympathy Coleridge and Southey met. Coleridge also brought along a young philosopher and poet, who had also been a Blue-Coat, by the name of Lovell.

These three young men talked philosophy, and came to the conclusion that the world was wrong. They said society was founded on a false hypothesis—they would better things. And so they planned packing up and away to America to found an Ideal Community on the banks of the Susquehanna. But hold! a society without women is founded on a false hypothesis—that's so—what to do? Now in America there are no women but Indian squaws.

But resource did not fail them—Southey thought of the Fricker family, a mile out on the Bristol road. There were three fine, strong, intelligent girls—what better than to marry 'em? The world should be peopled from the best. The girls were consulted and found willing to reorganize society on the communal basis, and so the three poets married the three sisters—more properly each of the three poets married a sister. “Thank God,” said Lamb, “that there were not four of those Fricker girls or I too would have been bagged, and the world peopled from the best!”

Southey got the only prize out of the hazard; Lovell's wife was so-so, and Coleridge drew a blank, or thought he did, which was the same thing; for as a man thinketh so is she. The thought of a lifetime on the banks of the Susquehanna with a woman who was simply pink and good, and who was never roused into animation even by his wildest poetic bursts, took all ambition out of him.

Funds were low and the immigration scheme was temporarily pigeonholed. After a short time Coleridge declared his mind was getting mildewed and packed off to London for mental oxygen and a little visit, leaving his wife in Southey's charge.

He was gone two years.

Lovell soon followed suit and Southey had three sisters in his household, all with babies.

In the meantime we find Southey installed at "Greta," just outside of the interesting town of Keswick, where the water comes down at Lodore. Southey was a general: he knew that knowledge consists in having a clerk who can find the thing. He laid out research work and literary schemes enough for several lifetimes, and the three sisters were hard at it. It was a little community of their own—all working for Southey, and glad of it. Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy lived at Grasmere, thirteen miles away, and they used to visit back and forth. When you go to Keswick you should tramp that thirteen miles—the man who has n't tramped from Keswick to Grasmere has dropped something out of his life. In merry jest, tipped with acid, someone called them "The Lake Poets," as if there were poets and lake poets. And Lamb was spoken of as "a Lake Poet by grace." Literary London grinned, as we do when someone speaks of the Sweet Singer of Michigan or the Chicago Muse. But the term of contempt stuck and, like the words, Methodist, Quaker, and Philistine, soon ceased to be a term of reproach and became something of which to be proud.

Mary Lamb

There is a lead-pencil factory at Keswick established in the year 1800. Pencils are made there to-day exactly as they were made then, and when you see the factory you are willing to believe it. All visitors at Keswick go to the Pencil Factory and buy pencils, such as Southey used, and get their names stamped on each pencil while they wait, without extra charge. On the wall is a silhouette picture of Southey, showing a needlessly large nose, and the gentlemanly old proprietor will tell you that Dorothy Wordsworth made the picture ; and then he will show you a letter, written by Charles Lamb, framed under glass, wherein C. L. says all pencils are fairish good but no pencils are so good as Keswick pencils.

For a while, when times were hard, Coleridge's wife worked here making pencils, while her archangel husband (a little damaged) went with Wordsworth to study metaphysics at Gottingen. When Coleridge came back and heard what his wife had done he reproved her—gently but firmly. Mrs. Ajax in a pencil factory huh!!

Southey had concluded that if Coleridge and Lovell were good samples of socialism he would stick to individualism. So he joined the Church of England, became a Monarchist, sang the praises of royalty, got a pension, became Poet Laureate, and rich—passing rich.

“Wh-wh-when he secured for himself the services of three good women he made a wise move,” said C. L.

And all the time Coleridge and Lamb were in correspondence; and when Coleridge was in London he kept close run of the Lambs. The father and old aunt had passed out and Charles and Mary lived together in rooms. They seemed to have moved very often—their record followed them. When the other tenants heard that “She’s the one that killed her mother,” they ceased to let their children play in the hallways, and the landlord apologized, coughed, and raised the rent. Poor Charles saw the point and did not argue it. He looked for other lodgings and having found 'em went home and said to Mary: "It's too noisy here, Sister,—I can't stand it—we'll have to go!"

Charles was a literary man now: a bookkeeper by day and a literary man by night. He wrote to please his sister, and all his jokes were for her. There is a genuine vein of pathos in all true humor, but think of the fear and the love and the tenderness that are concealed in Charles Lamb's work that was designed only to fight off dread calamity! And Mary copied and read and revised for her brother, and he told it all to her before he wrote it, and together they discussed it in detail. Charles studied mathematics, just to keep his genius under, he declared. Mary smiled and said it was n't necessary.

Coleridge used to drop in and the Stoddarts, Hazlitts, Godwin, and Lovell too. Then Southey was up in London and he called and so did Wordsworth and Dorothy, for Coleridge had spread Lamb's fame.

Mary Lamb

And Dorothy and Mary kissed each other and held hands under the table, and when Dorothy went back to Grasmere she wrote many beautiful letters to Mary and urged her to come and visit her—yes, come to Grasmere and live. The one point they held in common was a love for Coleridge; and as he belonged to neither there was no room for jealousy. The Fricker girls were all safely married, but Charles and Mary could not think of going—they needs must hide in a big city. “I hate your damned throistles and larks and bobolinks,” said C. L., in feigned contempt. “I sing the praises of the ‘Salutation and the Cat’ and a snug fourth-floor back.”

They could not leave London, for over them ever hung that black cloud of a mind diseased.

“I can do nothing; think nothing. Mary has another of her bad spells—we saw it coming, and I took her away to a place of safety,” writes Charles to Coleridge.

Mary Lamb

One writer tells of seeing Charles and Mary walking across Hampstead Heath, hand in hand, both crying. They were on the way to the asylum.

Fortunately these "illnesses" gave warning and Charles would ask his employer leave for a "holiday," and stay at home trying by gentle mirth and work to divert the dread visitor of unreason.

After each illness, in a few weeks the sister would be restored to her own, very weak and her mind a blank as to what had gone before. And so she never remembered that supreme calamity. She knew the deed had been done, but Heaven had absolved her gentle spirit from all participation in it. She often talked of her mother, wrote of her, quoted her, and that they should sometime be again united was her firm faith.

The Tales from Shakespeare were written at the suggestion of Godwin, seconded by Charles. The idea that she herself could write seemed never to have occurred to Mary, until Charles swore with a needless oath that all the ideas he ever had she supplied.

“Charles, dear, you’ve been drinking again!” said Mary. But the Tales sold and sold well; fame came that way and more money than the simple, plain home-keeping bodies needed. So they started a pension roll for sundry old ladies, and to themselves played high and mighty patron and figured, and talked and joked over the blue tea-cups as to what they should do with their money—five hundred pounds a year! Goodness gracious, if the Bank of England gets in a pinch advise C. L., at 34 Southampton Buildings, third floor, second turning to the left but one.

A Mrs. Reynolds was one of the pensioners, but no one knew it but Mrs. Reynolds, and she never told. She was a Lady of the Old School and used often to dine with the Lambs and get her snuff-box filled. Her husband had been a ship-captain or something, and when the tea was strong she would take snuff and tell the visitors about him and swear she had ever been true to his memory, though God knows all good-looking and clever widows are sorely tried in this scurvy world! Mrs. Reynolds met Thomas Hood at a "Saturday Evening" at the Lambs', and he was so taken with her that he has told us "she looked like an elderly wax doll in half mourning, and when she spoke it was as if by an artificial process; she always kept up the gurgle and buzz until run down."

Mrs. Reynolds's sole claim to literary distinction was the fact that she had known Goldsmith and he had presented her with an inscribed copy of The Deserted Village.

But we all have a tender place in our hearts for the elderly wax doll because the Lambs were so gentle and patient with her, and once a year went to Highgate and put a shilling vase of flowers over the grave of the Captain to whose memory she was ever true.

These friendless old souls used to meet and mix at the Lambs' with those whose names are now deathless. You cannot write the history of English Letters and leave the Lambs out. They were the loved and loving friends of Southey, Wordsworth, Coleridge, De Quincey, Jeffries, and Godwin. They won the recognition of all who prize the far reaching intellect—the subtle imagination. The pathos and tenderness of their lives entwine us with tendrils that hold our hearts in thrall.

They adopted a little girl, a beautiful little girl by the name of Emma Isola. And never was there child that was a greater joy to parents than was Emma Isola to Charles and Mary. The wonder is they did not spoil her with admiration, and by laughing at all her foolish little pranks. Mary set herself the task of educating this little girl and formed a class the better to do it—a class of three: Emma Isola, William Hazlitt's son, and Mary Victoria Novello. I met Mary Victoria once; she's over eighty years of age now. Her form is a little bent, but her eye is bright and her smile is the smile of youth. Folks call her Mary Cowden-Clarke.

And I want you to remember, dearie, that it was Mary Lamb who introduced the other Mary to Shakespeare, by reading to her the MS. of the Tales. And further, that it was the success of the Tales that fired Mary Cowden-Clarke with an ambition also to do a great Shakespearian work. There may be a question about the propriety of calling the Tales a great work—their simplicity seems to forbid it,—but the term is all right when applied to that splendid life-achievement, the Concordance, of which Mary Lamb was the grandmother.

Emma Isola married Edward Moxon, and the Moxon home was the home of Mary Lamb whenever she wished to make it so, to the day of her death. The Moxons did good by stealth, and were glad they never awoke and found it fame.

“What shall I do when Mary leaves me, never to return?" once said Charles to Manning. But Mary lived for full twenty years after Charles had gone, and lived only in loving memory of him who had devoted his life to her. She seemed to exist just to talk of him and to garland the grave in the little old churchyard at Edmonton, where he sleeps. Wordsworth says: "A grave is a tranquillizing object: resignation in time springs up from it as naturally as wild flowers bespread the turf." Her work was to look after the "pensioners" and carry out the wishes of "my brother Charles."

But the pensioners were laid away to rest, one after the other, and the gentle Mary, grown old and feeble, became a pensioner too, but, thanks to that divine humanity that is found in English hearts, she never knew it. To the last, she looked after "the worthy poor," and carried flowers once a year to the grave of the gallant Captain Reynolds at Highgate, and never tired of sounding the praises of Charles and excusing the foibles of Coleridge. She lived only in the past and its loving memories were more than a ballast 'gainst the ills of the present.

And so she went down into the valley and entered the great shadow, telling in cheerful, broken musings of a brother's love.

And then she was carried to the churchyard at Edmonton. There she rests in the grave with her brother. In life they were never separated, and in death they are not divided.

Delaford is a nice place I can tell you ; exactly what I call a nice old-fashioned place, full of comforts, quite shut in with great garden walls that are covered with fruit trees and such a mulberry tree in the corner. Then there is a dovecote, some delightful fish ponds, and a very pretty canal, and everything, in short, that one could wish for ; and moreover it 's close to the church and only a quarter of a mile from the turnpike road.

I.

IT was at Cambridge, England, I met him—a fine intelligent clergyman he was, too. “He’s not a ’Varsity man,” said my new acquaintance, speaking of Dr. Joseph Parker, the world’s greatest preacher. “If he were he would n’t do all these preposterous things, you know.”

“He’s a little like Henry Irving,” I ventured apologetically.

“True, and what absurd mannerisms—did you ever see the like! Yes, one’s from Yorkshire and the other from Cornwall, and both are Philistines.”

He laughed at his joke and so did I, for I always try to be polite.

Jane Austen

So I went my way, and as I strolled it came to me that my clerical friend was right—a university course might have taken all the individuality out of these strong men and made of their genius a purely neutral decoction.

And when I thought further and considered how much learning has done to banish wisdom, it was a satisfaction to remember that Shakespeare at Oxford did nothing beyond making the acquaintance of an inn-keeper's wife.

It hardly seems possible that a Harvard degree would have made a stronger man of Abraham Lincoln ; or that Edison, whose brain has wrought greater changes than that of any other man of the century, was the loser by not being versed in physics as taught at Yale.

The Law of Compensation never rests, and the men who are taught too much from books are not taught by Deity. Most education in the past has failed to awaken in its subject a degree of intellectual consciousness. It is the education that the Jesuits served out to the Indian. It made him peaceable but took all dignity out of him. From a noble red man he descended into a dirty Injun, who signed away his heritage for rum.

Jane Austen

The world's plan of education has mostly been priestly—we have striven to inculcate trust and reverence. We have cited authorities and quoted precedents and given examples: it was a matter of memory: while all the time the whole spiritual acreage was left untilled.

A race educated in this way never advances, save as it is jolted out of its notions by men with either a sublime ignorance of, or an indifference to what has been done and said. These men are always called barbarians by their contemporaries: they are jeered and hooted. They supply much mirth by their eccentricities. After they are dead the world sometimes canonizes them and carves on their tombs the word "Savior."

Do I then plead the cause of ignorance? Well, yes, rather so. A little ignorance is not a dangerous thing. A man who reads too much—who accumulates too many facts—gets his mind filled to the point of saturation ; matters then crystallize and his head becomes a solid thing that refuses to let anything either in or out. In his soul there is no guest-chamber. His only hope for progress lies in another incarnation.

Jane Austen

And so a certain ignorance seems a necessary equipment for the doing of a great work. To live in a big city and know what others are doing and saying ; to meet the learned and powerful, and hear their sermons and lectures ; to view the unending shelves of vast libraries is to be discouraged at the start. And thus we find that genius is essentially rural—a country product. Salons, soirées, theatres, concerts, lectures, libraries, produce a fine mediocrity that smiles at the right time and bows when 't is proper, but it is well to bear in mind that George Eliot, Elizabeth Barrett, Charlotte Brontë, and Jane Austen were all country girls, with little companionship, nourished on picked-up classics, having a healthy ignorance of what the world was saying and doing.

II.

JANE AUSTEN lived a hundred years ago. But when you tramp that five miles from Overton, where the railroad station is, to Steventon, where she was born, it does n't seem like it. Rural England does not change much. Great fleecy clouds roll lazily across the blue, overhead, and the hedgerows are full of twittering birds that you hear but seldom see ; and the pastures contain mild-faced cows that look at you with wide-open eyes over the stone walls, and in the towering elm trees that sway their branches in the breeze crows hold a noisy caucus. And it comes to you that the clouds and the blue sky and the hedgerows and the birds and the cows and the crows are all just as Jane Austen knew them—no change. These stone walls stood here then and so did the low slate-roofed barns and the whitewashed cottages where the roses clamber over the doors.

Jane Austen

I paused in front of one of these snug, homely, handsome pretty little cottages and looked at the two exact rows of flowers that lined the little walk leading from gate to cottage door. The pathway was made from coal ashes and the flower-beds were marked off by pieces of broken crockery set on edge. 'T was an absent-minded, impolite thing to do—to stand leaning on a gate and critically examine the landscape gardening, evidently an overworked woman's gardening, at that.

As I leaned there the door opened and a little woman with sleeves rolled up appeared. I mumbled an apology, but before I could articulate it she held out a pair of scissors and said, "Perhaps, sir, you'd like to clip some of the flowers—the roses over the door are best!"

Three children hung to her skirts,

Jane Austen

peeking 'round faces from behind, and quite accidentally disclosing a very neat ankle.

I took the scissors and clipped three splendid Jacqueminots and said it was a beautiful day. She agreed with me and added that she was just finishing her churning and if I'd wait a minute until the butter came, she'd give me a drink of buttermilk.

I waited without urging and got the buttermilk, and as the children had come out from hiding I was minded to give them a penny apiece. Two coppers were all I could muster, so I gave the two boys each a penny and the little girl a shilling. The mother protested that she had no change and that a bob was too much for a little girl like that, but I assumed a Big-Bonanza air and explained that I was from California where the smallest change is a dollar.

“Go thank the gentleman, Jane.”

Jane Austen

---

“How did you know her name was Jane Austen—Jane Austen Humphreys?”

“I did n't know—I only guessed.”

Then little Mrs. Humphreys ceased patting the butter and told me that she named her baby girl for Jane Austen, who used to live near here a long time ago. Jane Austen was one of the greatest writers that ever lived—the Rector said so. The Rev. George Austen preached at Steventon for years and years, and I should go and see the church—the same church where he preached and where Jane Austen used to go. And anything I wanted to know about Jane Austen's books the Rector could tell for he was a wonderful learned man was the Rector—“Kiss the gentleman, Jane.”

So I kissed Jane Austen's round, rosy cheek and stroked the tousled heads of the two boys by way of blessing, and started for Steventon to interview the Rector who was very wise.

And the clergyman who teaches his people the history of their neighborhood,

Jane Austen

and tells them of the excellent men and women who once lived thereabouts, is both wise and good. And the present Rector at Steventon is both—I'm sure of that.

III.

IT was a very happy family that lived in the Rectory at Steventon from 1775 to 1801. There were five boys and two girls, and the youngest girl's name was Jane. Between her and James, the oldest boy, lay a period of twelve years of three hundred and sixty-five days each, not to mention leap years.

The boys were sent away to be educated, and when they came home at holiday time they brought presents for the mother and the girls and there was great rejoicing.

James was sent to Oxford. The girls were not sent away to be educated—it was thought hardly worth while then to educate women, and some folks still hold to that belief. When the boys came home, they were made to stand by the door jamb, and a mark was placed on the casing, with a date, which showed how much they had grown. And they were catechized as to their knowledge and cross-questioned and their books inspected; and so we find one of the sisters saying, once, that she knew all of the things her brothers knew, and besides that she knew all the things she knew herself.

There were plenty of books in the library and the girls made use of them. They would read to their father "because his eyesight was bad," but I cannot help thinking this a clever ruse on the part of the good Rector.

I do not find that there were any secrets in that household, or that either Mr. or Mrs. Austen ever said that children should be seen and not heard. It was a little republic of letters—all their own. Thrown in on themselves, for not many of the yeomanry thereabouts could read, there was developed a fine spirit of comradeship among parents and children, brothers and sisters, servants and visitors, that is a joy to contemplate. Before the days of railroads a "visitor" was more of an institution than he is now. He stayed longer and was more welcome; and the news he brought from distant parts was eagerly asked for. Nowadays we know all about everything, almost before it happens, for yellow journalism is so alert that it discounts futurity.

Jane Austen

In the Austen household had lived and died a son of Warren Hastings. The lad had so won the love of the Austens that they even spoke of him as their own; and this bond also linked them to the great outside world of statecraft. The things the elders discussed were the properties too of the children.

Then once a year the Bishop came—came in knee breeches, hob-nailed shoes, and shovel hat, and the little church was decked with greens. The Bishop came from Paradise, little Jane used to think, and once, to be polite, she asked him how all the folks were in Heaven. Then the other children giggled and the Bishop spilt a whole cup of tea down the front of his best coat, and coughed and choked until he was very red in the face.

When Jane was ten years old there came to live at the Rectory a daughter of Mrs. Austen's sister. She came to them direct from France. Her name was Madame Fenillade. She was a widow and only twenty-two. Once when little Jane overheard one of the brothers say that Monsieur Fenillade had kissed Mademoiselle Guillotine, she asked what he meant and they would not tell her.

Now Madame spoke French with grace and fluency, and the girls thought it queer that there should be two languages—English and French—so they picked up a few words of French, too, and at the table would gravely say "Merci, Papa," and "S' il vous plaît, Mamma." Then Mr. Austen proposed that at table no one should speak anything but French. So Madame told them what to call the sugar and the salt and the bread, and no one called anything except by its French name. In two weeks each of the whole dozen persons who sat at that board, as well as the girl who waited on table, had a bill-of-fare working capital of French. In six months they could converse with ease.

And science with all its ingenuity has not yet pointed out a better way for acquiring a new language, than the plan the Austens adopted at Steventon Rectory. We call it the "Berlitz Method" now.

Madame Fenillade's widowhood rested lightly upon her, and she became quite the life of the whole household.

One of the Austen boys fell in love with the French widow; and surely it would be a very stupid country boy that would n't love a French widow like that!

And they were married and lived happily ever afterward.

But before Madame married and moved away she taught the girls charades, and then little plays, and a theatrical performance was given in the barn.

Jane Austen

Then a play could not be found that just suited, so Jane wrote one and Cassandra helped, and Madame criticised and the Rev. Mr. Austen suggested a few changes. Then it was all rewritten. And this was the first attempt at writing for the public by Jane Austen.

IV.

JANE AUSTEN wrote four great novels. Pride and Prejudice was begun when she was twenty and finished a year later. The old father started a course of novel-reading on his own account in order to fit his mind to pass judgment on his daughter's work. He was sure it was good, but feared that love had blinded his eyes and he wanted to make sure. After six months' comparison he wrote to a publisher explaining that he had the MS. of a great novel that would be parted with for a consideration. He assured the publisher that the novel was as excellent as any Miss Burney, Miss Edgeworth, or anyone else ever wrote.

Now publishers get letters like that by every mail, and when Mr. Austen received his reply it was so antarctic in sentiment that the MS. was stored away in the garret where it lay for just eleven years before it found a publisher. But in the meantime Miss Austen had written three other novels—not with much hope that anyone would publish them, but to please her father and the few intimate friends who read and sighed and smiled in quiet.

The year she was thirty years of age her father died—died with no thought that the world would yet endorse his own loving estimate of his daughter's worth.

After the father's death financial troubles came and something had to be done to fight off possible hungry wolves. The MS. was hunted out, dusted, gone over, and submitted to publishers. They sniffed at it and sent it back. Finally a man was found who was bold enough to read. He liked it but would n't admit the fact. Yet he decided to print it. He did so. The reading world liked it and said so, although not very loudly. Slowly the work made head, and small-sized London drafts were occasionally sent by publishers to Miss Austen with apologies because the amounts were not larger.

Jane Austen

Now in reference to writing books it may not be amiss to explain that no one ever said, "Now then, I'll write a story!" and sitting down at table took up pen and dipping it in ink, wrote. Stories don't come that way. Stories take possession of one—incident after incident—and you write in order to get rid of 'em—with a few other reasons mixed in, for motives, like silver, are always found mixed. Children play at keeping house: and men and women who have loved think of the things that have happened, then imagine all the things that might have happened, and from thinking it all over to writing it out is but a step. You begin one chapter and write it this forenoon, and do all you may to banish the plot the next chapter is all in your head before sundown. Next morning you write chapter number two, to unload it, and so the story spins itself out into a book. All this if you live in the country and have time to think and are not broken in upon by too much work and worry—save the worry of the ever restless mind. Whether the story is good or not depends upon what you leave out.

The sculptor produces the beautiful statue by chipping away such parts of the marble block as are not needed.

Really happy people do not write stories—they accumulate adipose tissue and die at the top through fatty degeneration of the cerebrum. A certain disappointment in life, a dissatisfaction with environment, is necessary to stir the imagination to a creative point. If things are all to your taste you sit back and enjoy them. You forget the flight of time, the march of the seasons, your future life, family, country—all, just as Antony did in Egypt. A deadly, languorous satisfaction comes over you. Pain, disappointment, unrest, or a joy that hurts, are the things that prick the mind into activity.

Jane Austen

Jane Austen lived in a little village. She felt the narrowness of her life—the inability of those beyond her own household to match her thoughts and emotions. Love came that way—a short heart-rest, a being understood, were hers. The gates of Paradise swung ajar and she caught a glimpse of the glories within, and sighed and clasped her hands and bowed her head in a prayer of thankfulness.

When she arose from her knees the gates were closed; the way was dark; she was alone—alone in a little quibbling, carping village, where tired folks worked and gossiped, ate, drank, slept. Her home was pleasant, to be sure, but man is a citizen of the world, not of a house.

Jane Austen began to write—to write about these village people. Jane was tall, and twenty—not very handsome, but better, she was good-looking. She looked good because she was. She was pious, but not too pious. She used to go calling among the parishioners, visiting the sick, the lowly, the troubled. Then when Great Folks came down from London to "the Hall," she went with the Rector to call on them too, for the Rector was servant to all—his business was to minister: he was a Minister. And the Reverend George Austen was a bit proud of his youngest daughter. She was just as tall as he, and dignified and gentle: and the clergyman chuckled quietly to himself to see how she was the equal in grace and intellect of any Fine Lady from Londontown.

And although the good Rector prayed, "From all vanity and pride of spirit, good Lord, deliver us," it never occurred to him that he was vain of his tall daughter Jane, and I'm glad it did n't. There is no more crazy bumble-bee gets into a mortal's bonnet than the buzzing thought that God is jealous of the affection we have for our loved ones. If we are ever damned, it will be because we have too little love for our fellows, not too much.

But, egad! brother, it's no small delight to be sixty and a little stooped and a trifle rheumatic, and have your own blessed daughter, sweet and stately, comb your thinning grey locks, help you on with your overcoat, find your cane, and go trooping with you, hand in hand, down the lane on merciful errand bent. It's a temptation to grow old and feign sciatica; and if you could only know that, someday, like old King Lear, upon your withered cheek would fall Cordelia's tears, the thought would be a solace.

So Jane Austen began to write stories about the simple folks she knew. She wrote in the family sitting-room at a little mahogany desk that she could shut up quickly if prying neighbors came in to tell their woes and ask questions about all those sheets of paper! And all she wrote she read to her father and to her sister Cassandra.

Jane Austen

And they talked it all over together and laughed and cried and joked over it. The kind old minister thought it a good mental drill for his girls to write and express their feelings. The two girls collaborated—that is to say one wrote and the other looked on. Neither girl had been “educated,” except what their father taught them. But to be born into a bookish family, and inherit the hospitable mind and the receptive heart, is better than to be sent to Harvard Annex.

Preachers, like other folks, sometimes assume a virtue when they have it not. But George Austen did n't pretend—he was. And that's the better plan, for no man can deceive his children—they take his exact measurement, whether others ever do or not; and the only way to win and hold the love of a child (or a grown-up) is to be frank and simple and honest. I've tried both schemes.

I cannot find that George Austen ever claimed he was only a worm of the dust, or pretended to be more or less than he was, or to assume a knowledge that he did not possess. He used to say, " My Dears, I really do not know. But let 's keep the windows open and light may yet come."

It was a busy family of plain average people—not very rich, and not very poor. There were difficulties to meet, and troubles to share, and joys to divide.

Jane Austen was born in 1775; "Jane Eyre" in 1816—one year before Jane Austen died.

Charlotte Brontë knew all about Jane Austen, and her example fired Charlotte's ambition. Both were daughters of country clergymen. Charlotte lived in the north of England on the wild and treeless moors, where the searching winds rattled the panes and black-faced sheep bleated piteously. Jane Austen lived in the rich quiet of a prosperous farming country, where bees made honey and larks nested. The Rev. Patrick Brontë disciplined his children: George Austen loved his. In Steventon there is no "Black Bull"; only a little dehorned inn, kept by a woman who hatches canaries, and will sell you a warranted singer for five shillings, with no charge for the cage. At Steventon no red-haired Yorkshiremen offer to give fight or challenge you to a drinking-bout.

The opposites of things are alike, and that is why the world ties Jane Eyre and Jane Austen in one bundle. Their methods of work were totally different : their effects gotten in different ways. Charlotte Brontë fascinates by startling situations and highly colored lights that dance and glow, leading you on in a mad chase. There 's pain, unrest, tragedy in the air. The pulse always is rapid and the temperature high.

It is not so with Jane Austen. She is an artist in her gentleness, and the world is to-day recognizing this more and more. The stage now works its spells by her methods—without rant, cant, or fustian—and as the years go by this must be so more and more, for mankind's face is turned toward truth.

Jane Austen

To weave your spell out of commonplace events and brew a love-potion from every-day materials is high art. When Kipling takes three average soldiers of the line, ignorant, lying, swearing, smoking, dog-fighting soldiers, who can even run on occasion, and by telling of them hold a world in thrall—that 's art! In these soldiers three we recognize something very much akin to ourselves, for the thing that holds no relationship to us does not interest us—we cannot leave the personal equation out. This fact is made plain in The Black Riders, where the devils dancing in Tophet look up and espying Steve Crane, address him thus : “ Brother ! ”

Jane Austen's characters are all plain, every-day folks. The work is always quiet. There are no entangling situations, no mysteries, no surprises.

Now, to present a situation, an emotion, so it will catch and hold the attention of others, is largely a knack—you practise on the thing until you do it well. This one thing I do. But the man who does this thing is not intrinsically any greater than those who appreciate it—in fact they are all made of the same kind of stuff. Kipling himself is quite a commonplace person. He is neither handsome nor magnetic. He is plain and manly and would fit in anywhere. If there was a trunk to be carried upstairs, or an ox to get out of a pit, you 'd call on Kipling if he chanced that way, and he 'd give you a lift as a matter of course, and then go on whistling with hands in his pockets. His art is a knack practised to a point that gives facility.

Jane Austen

Jane Austen was a commonplace person. She swept, sewed, worked, and did the duty that lay nearest her. She wrote because she liked to, and because it gave pleasure to others. She wrote as well as she could. She had no thought of immortality, or that she was writing for the ages—no more than Shakespeare had. She never anticipated that Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, Guizot, and Macaulay would hail her as a marvel of insight, nor did she suspect that a woman as great as George Eliot would declare her work flawless.

Jane Austen

But to-day strong men recognize her books as rarely excellent, because they show the divinity in all things, keep close to the ground; gently inculcate the firm belief that simple people are as necessary as great ones, that small things are not necessarily unimportant, and that nothing is really insignificant. It all rings true.

And so I sing the praises of the average woman—the woman who does her work, who is willing to be unknown, who is modest and unaffected, who tries to lessen the pains of earth, and to add to its happiness. She is the true guardian angel of mankind!

No book published in Jane Austen's lifetime bore her name on the title-page; she was never lionized by society; she was never two hundred miles from home; she died when forty-two years of age, and it was sixty years before a biography was attempted or asked for. She sleeps in the cathedral at Winchester, and not so very long ago a visitor, on asking the verger to see her grave, was conducted thither, and the verger asked, "Was she anybody in particular? so many folks ask where she 's buried, you know!"

But this is changed now, for when the verger took me to her grave and we stood by that plain black marble slab, he spoke intelligently of her life and work. And many visitors now go to the cathedral only because it is the resting-place of Jane Austen, who lived a beautiful, helpful life and produced great art, yet knew it not.

EMPRESS JOSEPHINE

You have met General Bonaparte in my house. Well—he it is who would supply a father's place to the orphans of Alexander de Beauharnais, and a husband's to his widow. I admire the General's courage, the extent of his information, for, on all subjects he talks equally well, and the quickness of his judgment, which enables him to seize the thoughts of others almost before they are expressed ; but, I confess it, I shrink from the despotism he seems desirous of exercising over all who approach him. His searching glance has something singular and inexplicable, which imposes even on our Directors ; judge if it may not intimidate a woman. Even—what ought to please me—the force of a passion, described with an energy that leaves not a doubt of his sincerity, is precisely the cause which arrests the consent I am often on the point of pronouncing.

EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

I.

IT was a great life, dearie, a great life! Charles Lamb used to study mathematics to subdue his genius, and I'll have to tinge truth with gray in order to keep this little sketch from appearing like a red Ruritania romance.

Josephine was born on an island in the Caribbean Sea, a long way from France. The Little Man was an islander too. They started for France about the same time, from different directions, each of course totally unaware that the other lived. They started on the order of that joker Fate, in order to scramble continental politics, and make omelet of the world's pretensions.

Empress Josephine

Josephine's father was Captain Tascher. Do you know who Captain Tascher was? Very well, there is satisfaction then in knowing that no one else does either. He seems to have had no ancestors; and he left no successor save Josephine.

We know a little less of Josephine's mother than we do of her father. She was the daughter of a Frenchman whom the world had plucked of both money and courage, and he moved to the West Indies to vegetate and brood on the vanity of earthly ambitions. Young Captain Tascher married the planter's daughter in the year 1762. The next year a daughter was born, and they called her name Josephine.

Not long after her birth, Captain Tascher thought to mend his prospects by moving to one of the neighboring islands. His wife went with him, but they left the baby girl in the hands of a good old aunt, until they could corral fortune and make things secure for this world at least.

They never came back, for they died and were buried.

Josephine never had any recollection of her parents. But the aunt was gentle and kindly, and life was simple and cheap. There was plenty to eat, and no clothing to speak of was required, for the equator was only a stone's throw away ; in fact it was in sight of the house, as Josephine herself has said.

There was a Catholic church near, but no school. Yet Josephine learned to read and write. She sang with the negroes and danced and swam and played leap-frog. When she was nine years old, her aunt told her she must not play leap-frog any more, but she should learn to embroider and to play the harp and read poetry. Then she would grow up and be a fine lady.

And Josephine thought it a bit hard, but said she would try.

She was tall and slender but not very handsome. Her complexion was rather yellow, her hands bony. But the years brought grace, and even if her features were not pretty she had one thing that was better, a gentle voice. So far as I know, no one ever gave her lessons in voice culture either. Perhaps the voice is the true index of the soul. Josephine's voice was low, sweet, and so finely modulated that when she spoke others would pause to listen—not to the words, just to the voice.

Empress Josephine

Occasionally visitors came to the island and were received at the old rambling mansion where Josephine's aunt lived. From them the girl learned about the great, outside world with its politics and society and strife and rivalry ; and when the visitor went away Josephine had gotten from him all he knew. So the young woman became wise without school and learned without books.

A year after the memorable year of 1776, there came to the island, Vicomte Alexander Beauharnais. He had come direct from America, where he had fought on the side of the Colonies against the British. He was full of republican principles. Paradoxically, he was also rich and idle and somewhat of an adventurer.

He called at the old aunt's, Madame Renaudin's, and called often. He fell violently in love with Josephine. I say violently, for that was the kind of man he was. He was thirty, she was fifteen. His voice was rough and guttural, so I do not think he had much inward grace. Josephine's fine instincts rebelled at thought of accepting his proffered affection. She explained that she was betrothed to another, a neighboring youth of about her own age, whose thoughts and feelings matched hers.

Beauharnais said that was nothing to him, and appealed to the old folks, displaying his title, submitting an inventory of his estate ; and the old folks agreed to look into the matter. They did so and explained to Josephine that she should not longer hold out against the wishes of those who had done so much for her.

And so Josephine relented and they were married, although it cannot truthfully be said they lived happily ever afterward. They started for France on their wedding tour. In six weeks they arrived in Paris. Returned soldiers and famed travellers are eagerly welcomed by society; especially is this so when the traveller brings a Creole wife from the equator. The couple supplied a new thrill, and society in Paris is always eager for a new thrill.

Vicomte Beauharnais and his wife became quite the rage. It was expected that the Creole lady would be beautiful but dull; instead, she was not so very beautiful but very clever. She dropped into all the graceful ways of polite society intuitively.

In a year, domestic life slightly interfered with society's claims—a son was born. They called his name Eugene.

Two more years and a daughter was born. They called her name Hortense.

Josephine was only twenty, but the tropics and social experience and maternity had given ripeness to her life. She became thoughtful and inclined rather to stay at home with her babies than chase fashion's butterflies.

Beauharnais chased fashion's butterflies, and caught them, too, for he came home late and quarrelled with his wife—a sure sign.

He drank a little, gamed more, sought excitement, and talked politics needlessly loud in underground cafés.

Men who are woefully lax in their marriage relations are very apt to regard their wives with suspicion. If Beauharnais had been weighed in the balances he would have been found wanton. He instituted proceedings against Josephine for divorce.

And Josephine packed up a few scanty effects and taking her two children started for her old home in the West Indies. It took all the money she had to pay passage.

It was the old, old story—a few years of gay life in the great city, then cruelty

Empress Josephine

too great for endurance, tears, shut white lips, a firm resolve—and back to the old farm where homely, loyal hearts await, and outstretched arms welcome the sorrowful, yet glad return.

Beauharnais failed to get his divorce. The court said “no cause for action.” He awoke, stared stupidly about, felt the need of sympathy in his hour of undoing, and looked for—Josephine.

She was gone.

He tried absinthe, gambling, hot dissipation; but he could not forget. He had sent away his granary and storehouse; his wand of wealth and heart's desire. Two ways opened for peace, only two: a loaded pistol—or get her back.

First he would try to get her back, and the pistol should be held in reserve in case of failure.

Josephine forgave and came back; for a good woman forgives to seventy times seven.

Beauharnais met her with all the tenderness a lover could command. The ceremony of marriage was again sacredly solemnized. They retired to the country and with their two children lived three of the happiest months Josephine ever knew ; at least Josephine said so, and the fact that she made the same remark about several other occasions is no reason for doubting her sincerity. Then they moved back to Paris.

Beauharnais sobered his ambitions, and kept good hours. He was a soldier in the employ of the king, but his sympathies were with the people. He was a Republican with a Royalist bias but some said he was a Royalist with a Republican bias.

Josephine looked after her household, educated her children, did much charitable work, and knew what was going on in the state.

But those were troublous times. Murder was in the air and revolution was rife. That mob of a hundred thousand women had tramped out to Versailles and brought the king back to Paris. He had been beheaded, and Marie Antoinette had followed him. The people were in power and Beauharnais had labored to temper their wrath with reason. He had even been Chairman of the Third Convention. He called himself Citizen. But the fact that he was of noble birth was remembered, and in September, of 1793, three men called at his house. When Josephine looked out of the window, she saw by the wan light of the moon a file of soldiers standing stiff and motionless.

Empress Josephine

She knew the time had come. They marched Citizen Beauharnais to the Luxembourg.

In a few feverish months, they came back for his wife. Her they placed in the nunnery of the Carmelites—that prison where, but a few months before, a mob relieved the keepers of their vigils by killing all their charges.

Robespierre was supreme. Now Robespierre had come into power by undoing Danton. Danton had helped lug in the Revolution, but when he touched a match to the hay he did not really mean to start a conflagration, only a bonfire.

He tried to dampen the blaze, and Robespierre said he was a traitor and led him to the guillotine. Robespierre worked the guillotine until the bearings grew hot. Still the people who rode in the death-tumbril did not seem so very miserable. Despair pushed far enough completes the circle and becomes peace—a peace like unto security. It is the last stage: hope is gone, but the comforting thought of heroic death and an eternal sleep takes its place.

When Josephine at the nunnery of the Carmelites received from the Luxembourg prison a package containing a generous lock of her husband's hair, she knew it had been purchased from the executioner.

Now the prison of the Carmelites was unfortunately rather crowded. In fact it was full to the roof-tile. Five ladies were obliged to occupy one little cell. One of these ladies in the cell with

Josephine was Madame Fontenay. Now Madame Fontenay was fondly loved by Citizen Tallien, who was a member of the Assembly over which Citizen Robespierre presided. Citizen Tallien did not explain his love for Madame to the public because Madame chanced to be the wife of another. So how could Robespierre know that when he imprisoned Madame he was touching the tenderest tie that bound his friend Tallien to earth?

Robespierre sent word to the prison of the Carmelites that Madame Fontenay and Madame Beauharnais should prepare for death—they were guilty of plotting against the people.

Now Tallien came daily to the prison of the Carmelites, not to visit of course, but to see that the prisoners were properly restrained. A cabbage stalk was thrown out of a cell window, and Tallien found in the stalk a note from his lady-love to this effect: "I am to die in two days; to save me you must overthrow Robespierre."

Empress Josephine

The next day there was trouble when the Convention met. Tallien got the platform and denounced Robespierre in a Cassius voice as a traitor—the arch enemy of the people—a plotter for self. To emphasize his remarks he brandished a glittering dagger. Other orations followed in like vein. All orders that Robespierre had given out were abrogated by acclamation. Two days and Robespierre was made to take a dose of the medicine he had so often prescribed for others. He was beheaded by Samson, his own servant, July 15, 1794.

Immediately all “suspects” imprisoned on his instigation were released.

Madame Fontenay and the widow Beauharnais were free. Soon after this Madame Fontenay became Madame Tallien. Josephine got her children back from the country, but her property was gone and she was in sore straits. But she had friends, yet none so loyal and helpful as Citizen Tallien and his wife. Their home was hers.

Empress Josephine

And it was there she met a man by the name of Barras, and there too she met a man who was a friend of Barras ; by name, Bonaparte—Napoleon Bonaparte. Bonaparte was twenty-six. He was five feet two inches high and weighed one hundred and twenty pounds. He was beardless and looked like a boy, and at that time his face was illumined by an eruption.

Out of employment and waiting for something to turn up, he yet had a very self-satisfied manner.

His peculiar way of listening to conversation — absorbing everything and giving nothing out—made one uncomfortable. Josephine, seven years his senior, did not like the youth. She had had a wider experience and been better brought up than he, and she let him know it, but he did not seem especially abashed.

II.

JUST what the French Revolution was no one has yet told us. Read "Carlyle" backward or forward and it is grand: it puts your head in a whirl of heroic intoxication, but it does not explain the Revolution. Suspicion, hate, tyranny, revenge, fear, mawkish sentimentality, mad desire, were in the air. One leader was deposed because he did nothing, and his successor was carried to the guillotine because he did too much. Convention after convention was dissolved and re-formed. On the fourth of October, 1795, there was a howl and a roar and a shriek from forty thousand citizens of Paris. No one knew just what they wanted—the forty thousand did not explain. Perhaps it was nothing—only the leaders who wanted power. They demanded that the Convention should be dissolved: certain men must be put out and others put in.

The Convention convened and all the members felt to see if their heads were in proper place—to-morrow they might not be. The room was crowded to suffocation. Spectators filled the windows, perched on the gallery railing, climbed and clung on the projecting parts of columns. High up on one of these columns sat the young man, Bonaparte, silent, unmoved, still waiting for something to turn up.

The Convention must protect itself, and the call was for Barras. Barras had once successfully parleyed with insurrection—he must do so again. Barras turned bluish-white, for he knew that to deal with this mob successfully a man must be blind and deaf to pity. He struggled to his feet—he looked about helplessly—the Convention silently waited to catch the words of its savior.

High up on a column Barras spied the

---

lithe form of the artillery major, whom he had seen, with face of bronze, deal out grape and canister at Toulon. Barras raised his hand and pointing at the young officer cried, "There, there is the man who can save you!"

The Convention nominated the little man by acclamation as commander of the city's forces. He slid down from his perch, took half an hour to ascertain whether the soldiers were on the side of the mob or against it—for it was, usually a toss-up,—and decided to accept the commandant. Next day the mob surrounded the Tuileries in the name of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality. The Terrorists entreated the soldiers to throw down their arms, then they reviled and cajoled and cursed and sang, and the women as usual were in the vanguard. Paris recognized the divine right of insurrection. Who dare shoot into such a throng!

The young artillery major dare. He gave the word and red death mowed wide

swaths, and the balls spat against the walls and sang through the windows of the Church of St. Roche where the mob was centred. Again and again he fired. It began at Four by the clock and at Six all good people, and bad, had retired to their homes, and Paris was law-abiding.

The Convention named Napoleon General of the Interior, and the French Revolution became from that moment a thing that was.

III.

OF course no one in Paris was so much talked of as the young artillery officer. Josephine was a bit proud that she had met him, and possibly a little sorry that she had treated him so coldly. He only wished to be polite !

Josephine was an honest woman, but still, she was a woman. She desired to be well thought of, and to be well thought of by men in power. Her son Eugene was fifteen, and she had ambitions for him : and to this end she saw the need of keeping in touch with the Powers. Josephine was a politician and a diplomat, for all women are diplomats. She arrayed Eugene in his Sunday-best and told him to go to the General of the Interior and explain that his name was

Eugene Beauharnais, that his father was the martyred patriot, General Beauharnais, and that this beloved father's sword was in the archives over which Providence had placed the General of the Interior. Furthermore, the son should request that the sword of his father be given him so that it might be used in defence of France if need be.

And it was so done.

The whole thing was needlessly melodramatic, and Napoleon laughed. The poetry of war was to him a joke. But he stroked the youth's curls, asked after his mother, and ordered his secretary to go fetch that sword.

So the boy carried the sword home and was very happy, and his mother was very happy and proud of him, and she kissed him on both cheeks and kissed the sword and thought of the erring, yet generous man who once had carried it. Then she thought it would be but proper for her to go and thank the man who had given the sword back ; for had he not stroked her boy's curls and told him he was a fine young fellow, and asked after his mother!

So the next day she went to call on the man who had so graciously given the sword back. She was kept waiting a little while in the ante-room, for Napoleon always kept people waiting—it was a good scheme. When admitted to the presence, the General of the Interior, in simple corporal's dress, did not remember her. Neither did he remember about giving the sword back—at least he said so. He was always a trifler with women, though; and it was so delicious to have this tearful widow remove her veil and explain, for gadzooks! had she not several times allowed the mercury to drop to zero for his benefit?

And so she explained, and gradually it all came back to him—very slowly and after cross-questioning—and then he was so glad to see her. When she went away, he accompanied her to the outer door, bare-headed, and as they walked down the long hallway she noted the fact that he was not so tall as she by three inches. He shook hands with her as they parted and said he would call on her when he had gotten a bit over the rush.

Josephine went home in a glow. She did not like the man—he had humiliated her by making her explain who she was, and his manner, too, was offensively familiar. And yet he was a power, there was no denying that, and to know men of power is a satisfaction to any woman. He was twenty years younger than Beauharnais, the mourned—twenty years! Then Beauharnais was tall and had a splendid beard and wore a dangling sword. Beauharnais was of noble birth, educated, experienced, but he was dead; and here was a beardless boy being called the Chief Citizen of France. Well, well, well!

She was both pleased and hurt—hurt to think she had been humbled, and pleased to think such attentions had been paid her. In a few days the young general called on the widow to crave forgiveness for not having recognized her when she had called on him. It was very stupid in him, very !

Empress Josephine

She forgave him.

He complimented Eugene in terse, lavish terms, and when he went away kissed Hortense, who was thirteen and thought herself too big to be kissed by a strange man. But Napoleon said they all seemed just like old friends. And seeming like old friends he called often.

Josephine knew Paris and Parisian society thoroughly. Fifteen years of close contact in success and defeat with statesmen, soldiers, diplomats, artists, and literati had taught her much. It is probable that she was the most gifted woman in Paris. Now Napoleon learned by induction as Josephine had, and as all women do, and as genius must, for life is short—only dullards spend eight years at Oxford. He absorbed Josephine as the devil-fish does its prey. And to get every thought and feeling that a good woman possesses you must win her completest love. In this close contact she gives up all—unlike Sapphira—holding nothing back.

Among educated people, people of breeding and culture, Napoleon felt ill at ease. With this woman at his side he would be at home anywhere. And feeling at once that he could win her only by honorable marriage he decided to marry her. He was ambitious. Has that been remarked before? Well, one cannot always be original—still I think the facts bear out the statement. Josephine was ambitious too, but somehow in this partnership she felt that she would bring more capital into the concern than he, and she hesitated.

But power had given dignity to the Little Man ; his face had taken on the cold beauty of marble. Success was better than sarsaparilla. Josephine was aware of his growing power, and his persistency was irresistible ; and so one evening when he dropped in for a moment, her manner told all. He just took her in his arms, and kissing her very tenderly whispered, "My dear, together we will win," and went his way. When he wished to be, Napoleon was the ideal lover ; he was master of that fine forbearance, flavored with a dash of audacity, that women so appreciate. He never wore love to a frazzle, nor caressed the object of his affections into fidgets ; neither did he let her starve, although she might at times go hungry.

Empress Josephine

However, the fact remains that Josephine married the man to get rid of him ; but that 's a thing women are constantly doing.

The ceremony was performed by a Justice of the Peace, March 9, 1796. It was just five months since the bride had called to thank the groom for giving back her husband's sword, and fifteen months after this husband's death. Napoleon was twenty-seven ; Josephine was thirty-three, but the bridegroom swore he was twenty-eight and the lady twenty-nine. As a fabricator he wins our admiration.

Twelve days after the marriage, Napoleon set out for Italy as Commander-in-chief of the army. To trace the brilliant campaign of that year, when the tri-color of France was carried from the Bay of Biscay to the Adriatic Sea, is not my business. Suffice it to say that it placed the name of Bonaparte among the foremost names of military leaders of all time. But amid the restless movement of grim war and the glamour of success he never for a day forgot his Josephine. His letters breathe a youthful lover's affection, and all the fond desires of his life were hers. Through her he also knew the pulse and temperature of Paris—its form and pressure.

It was a year before they saw each other. She came on to Milan and met him there. They settled in Montebello, at a beautiful country seat, six miles from the city. From there he conducted negotiations for peace,—and she presided over the gay social circles of the ancient capital. "I gain provinces; you win hearts," said Napoleon. It was a very Napoleonic remark.

Empress Josephine

Napoleon had already had Eugene with him, and together they had seen the glory of battle. Now Hortense was sent for, and they were made Napoleon's children by adoption. These were days of glowing sunshine and success and warm affection.

And so Napoleon with his family returned to France amid bursts of applause, proclaimed everywhere the Savior of the State, its Protector, and all that. Civil troubles had all vanished in the smoke of war with foreign enemies. Prosperity was everywhere, the fruits of conquest had satisfied all, and the discontented class had been drawn off into the army and killed or else was now cheerfully boozy with success.

Napoleon made allies of all powers he could not easily undo, and proffered his support—biding his time. Across the English Channel he looked and stared with envious eyes. Josephine had tasted success and known defeat. Napoleon had only tasted success. She begged that he would rest content and hold secure that which he had gained. Success in its very nature must be limited, she said. He laughed and would not hear it. For the first time she felt her influence over him was waning. She had given her all; he greedily absorbed, and now had come to believe in his own omniscience. He told her that on a pinch he could get along without her—within himself he held all power. Then he kissed her hand in mock gallantry and led her to the door, as he would be alone.

When Napoleon started on the Egyptian campaign, Josephine begged to go with him; other women went, dozens of them. They seemed to look upon it as a picnic party. But Napoleon, insisting that absence makes the heart grow fonder, said his wife should remain behind.

Josephine was too good and great for the wife of such a man. She saw through him. She understood him, and only honest men are willing to be understood. He was tired of her, for she no longer ministered to his vanity. He had captured her, and now he was done with her. Besides that, she sided with the peace party, and this was intolerable. Still he did not beat her with a stick; he treated her most graciously, and installing her at beautiful Malmaison, provided her with everything to make her happy.

And if "things" could make one happy, she would have been.

And as for the Egyptian campaign, it surely was a picnic party, or it was until things got so serious that frolic was supplanted by fear. You can't frolic with your hair on end like quills upon the fretful porcupine. Napoleon did not write to his wife. He frolicked. Occasionally his secretary sent her a formal letter of instruction, and when she at last wrote him asking an explanation for such strange silence, the Little Man answered her with accusations of infidelity.

Josephine decided to secure a divorce, and there is pretty good proof that papers were prepared; and had the affair been carried along, the courts would have at once allowed the separation on statutory grounds. However, the papers were destroyed, and Josephine decided to live it out. But Napoleon had heard of these proposed divorce proceedings and was furious. When he came back, it was with the intention of immediate legal separation—in any event separation.

He came back and held out haughtily for three days, addressing her as "Madame," and refusing so much as to shake hands. After the three days he sued for peace and cried it out on his knees with his head in her lap. It was not genuine humility, only the humility that follows debauch. Napoleon had many kind impulses, but his mood was selfish indifference to the rights or wishes of others. He did not hold hate, yet the thought of a divorce from Josephine was palliated in his own mind by the thought that she had first suggested it. "I took her at her word," he once said to Bertram, as if the thing were pricking him.

And so matters moved on. There was war, and rumors of war, alway; but the vanquished paid the expenses. It was thought best that France should be ruled by three consuls. Three men were elected, with Napoleon as First Consul. The First Consul bought off the Second and Third Consuls and replaced them with two wooden men from the Twenty-first Ward.

Josephine worked for the glory of France and for her husband: she was diplomat and adviser. She placated enemies and made friends.

France prospered, and in the wars the foreigner usually not only paid the bills, but a goodly tribute beside. Nothing is so good as war to make peace at home. An insurrectionist at home makes a splendid soldier abroad. Napoleon's battles were won by the "dangerous class."

As the First Consul was Emperor in fact, the wires were pulled, and he was made so in name. His wife was made Empress: it must be so, as a breath of disapproval might ruin the whole scheme. Josephine was beloved by the people, and the people must know that she was honored by her husband. With a woman's intuition, Josephine saw the end—power grows until it topples. She pleaded, begged—it was of no avail,—the tide swept her with it, but whither, whither? she kept asking.

Meantime Hortense had been married to Louis, brother of Napoleon. In due time Napoleon found himself a grandfather. He both liked it and did n't. He considered himself a youth and took a pride in being occasionally mistaken for a recruit, and here some newspaper had called him "granddaddy," and people had laughed! He was not even a father, except by law—not nature,—and that's no father at all for nature does not recognize law. He joked with Josephine about it, and she turned pale.

There is no subject on which men so deceive themselves as concerning their motives for doing certain things. On no subject do mortals so deceive themselves as their motives for marriage. Their acts may be all right, but the reasons they give for doing them never are. Napoleon desired a new wife because he wished a son to found a dynasty.

Empress Josephine

“You have Eugene!” said Josephine.

“He’s my son by proxy,” said Napoleon, with a weary smile.

All motives, like ores, are found mixed, and counting the whole at one hundred, Napoleon’s desire for a son after the flesh should stand as ten—other reasons ninety. All men wish to be thought young. Napoleon was forty, and his wife was forty-seven. Talleyrand had spoken of them as Old Mr. and Mrs. Bonaparte.

A man of forty is only a giddy youth, according to his own estimate. Girls of twenty are his playfellows. A man of sixty, with a wife forty, and babies coming, is not old—bless me! But suppose his wife is nearly seventy—what then! Napoleon must have a young wife. Then by marrying Marie Louise, Austria could be held as friend : it was very necessary to do this. Austria must be secured as an ally at any cost—even at the cost of Josephine. It was painful, but must be done for the good of France. The State should stand first in the mind of every loyal, honest man : all else is secondary.

So Josephine was divorced, but was provided with an annuity that was preposterous in its lavish proportions. It amounted to over half a million dollars a year.

I once knew a man who, on getting home from the club at two o'clock in the morning, was reproached by his wife for his shocking condition. He promptly threw the lady over the banisters. Next day he purchased her a diamond necklace at the cost of a year's salary, but she could not wear it out in society for a month on account of her black eye.

Napoleon divorced Josephine that he might be the father of a line of kings. When he abdicated in 1815, he declared his son, the child of Marie Louise, "Louis

Empress Josephine

---

II., Emperor of France," and the world laughed. The son died before he had fairly reached manhood's estate. Napoleon III., son of Hortense, Queen of Holland, the grandson of Josephine, reigned long and well as Emperor of France. The Prince Imperial—a noble youth,—great-grandson of Josephine, was killed in Africa while fighting the battle of the nation that naid Napoleon.

Josephine was a parent of kings: Napoleon was not.

When Bonaparte was banished to Elba, and Marie Louise was nowhere to be seen, Josephine wrote to him words of consolation, offering to share his exile.

She died not long after—on the second of June, 1814.

After viewing that gaudy tomb at the Invalides, and thinking of the treasure in tears and broken hearts that it took to build it, it will rest you to go to the simple village church at Ruel, a half hour's ride from the Arc de Triomphe, where sleeps Josephine, Empress of France.

MARY W. SHELLEY

Shelley, beloved! the year has a new name from any thou knowest. When spring arrives, leaves that you never saw will shadow the ground, and flowers you never beheld will star it, and the grass will be of another growth. Thy name is added to the list which makes the earth bold in her age, and proud of what has been. Time, with slow, but unwearied feet, guides her to the goal that thou has reached ; and I, her unhappy child, am advanced still nearer the hour when my earthly dress shall repose near thine, beneath the tomb of Cestius.

WHEN Emerson borrowed from Wordsworth that fine phrase about plain living and high thinking, no one was more astonished than he that Whitman and Thoreau should take him at his word. He was decidedly curious about their experiment. But he kept a safe distance between himself and the shirt-sleeved Walt; and as for Henry Thoreau—bless me! Emerson regarded him only as a fine savage, and told him so. Of course Emerson loved solitude, but it was the solitude of a library or an orchard, and not the solitude of plain or wilderness. Emerson looked upon Beautiful Truth as an honored guest. He adored her, but it was with the adoration of the intellect. He never got her tag in jolly chase of comradery ; nor did he converse with her, soft and low, when only the moon peeked out from behind the silvery clouds, and the nightingale listened. He never laid himself open to damages. And when he threw a bit of a bomb into Harvard Divinity School it was the shrewdest bid for fame that ever preacher made.

I said "shrewd"—that 's the word. Emerson had the instincts of Connecticut ; that peculiar development of men who have eked out existence on a rocky soil, banking their houses against grim winter or grimmer savage foes. With this Yankee shrewdness went a subtle and sweeping imagination, and a fine appreciation of the excellent things that men have said and done. But he was never so foolish as to imitate the heroic—he simply admired it from afar. He advised others to work their poetry up into life but he did not do so himself. He never cast the bantling on the rocks, nor caused him to be suckled with the she-wolf's teat. He admired "abolition" from a distance. When he went away from home it was always with a return ticket. He has summed up Friendship in an essay as no man ever has, and yet there was a self-protective aloofness in his friendship that made icicles gather, as George William Curtis has explained.

In no relation of his life was there a complete abandon. His Essay on Self-Reliance is beef iron, and wine, and Works and Days is a tonic for tired men; and yet I know that in spite of all his pretty talk about living near to Nature's heart he never ventured into the woods outside of hallooing distance from the house. He could neither ride a horse, shoot, nor sail a boat—and being well aware of it never tried. All of his farming was done by proxy; and when he writes to Carlyle late in life, explaining how he is worth forty thousand dollars, well secured by first mortgages, he makes clear one half of his ambition.

And yet, I call him master, and will match my admiration for him, 'gainst that of any other, six nights and days together. But I summon him here only to contrast his character with that of another—another, who, like himself, was twice married.

In his Essay on Love Emerson reveals just an average sophomore insight; and in his work I do not find a mention or a trace of influence exercised by either of the two women whom he wedded, nor by any other woman. Shelley was what he was through the influence of the two women he married.

Shelley wrecked the life of one of these women. She found surcease of sorrow in death; and when her body was found in the Serpentine he had a premonition that the hungry waves were waiting for him too. But before her death and through her death she pressed home to him the bitterest sorrow that man can ever know: the combined knowledge that he has mortally injured a human soul and the sense of helplessness to minister to its needs. Harriet Westbrook said to Shelley, drink ye all of it. And could he speak now he would say that the bitterness of the potion was a formative influence as potent as that of the gentle ministrations of Mary Wollstonecraft, who broke over his head the precious vase of her heart's-love and wiped his feet with the hairs of her head.

In the poetic sweetness, gentleness, lovableness, and beauty of their natures Emerson and Shelley were very similar. In a like environment they would have done the same things. A pioneer ancestry with its struggle for material existence would have given Shelley caution; and a noble patronymic, fostered by the state, lax in its discipline, would have made Emerson toss discretion to the winds.

Emerson and Shelley were both apostles of the good, the true, and the beautiful. One rests at Sleepy Hollow, his grave marked by a great rough-hewn boulder, while overhead the winds sigh a requiem through the pines. The ashes of the other were laid beneath the moss-grown wall of the Eternal City, and the creeping vines and flowers, as if jealous of the white, carved marble, snuggle close over the spot with their leaves and petals.

Yet both of these men achieved immortality, for their thoughts live again in the thoughts of the race, and their hopes and aspirations mingle and are one with the men and women of earth who think and feel and dream.

II

IT was Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin who awoke in Shelley such a burst of song that men yet listen to its cadence. It was she who gave his soul wings : her gentle spirit blending with his made music that has enriched the world. Without her he was fast beating out his life against the bars of unkind condition, but together they worked and sang. All of his best lines were recited to her, all were weighed in the critical balances of her woman's judgment. She it was who first wrote it out, and then gave it back. Together they revised ; and after he had passed on, she it was who collected the scattered leaves, added the final word, and gave us the book we call Shelley's Poems.

Perhaps we might call all poetry the child of parents, but with Shelley's poems this is literally true.

Mary Shelley delighted in the name, Wollstonecraft. It was her mother's name ; and was not Mary Wollstonecraft the foremost intellectual woman of her day ? a woman of purpose, forceful yet gentle, appreciative, kind.

Mary Wollstonecraft was born in 1759; and tiring of the dull monotony of a country town went up to London when yet a child and fought the world alone. By her own efforts she grew learned ; she had all science, all philosophy, all history at her fingers' ends. She became able to speak several languages, and by her pen an income was secured that was not only sufficient for herself but ministered to the needs of an aged father and mother and sisters as well.

Mary Wollstonecraft wrote one great book (which is all anyone can write): A Vindication of the Rights of Woman. It sums up all that has since been written on the subject. Like an essay by Herbert

Spencer, it views the matter from every side, anticipates every objection—exhausts the subject. The literary style of Mary Wollstonecraft's book is Johnsonese, but its thought forms the base of all that has come after. It is the great-great-grandmother of all woman's clubs and these thousand efforts that women are now putting forth along economic, artistic and social lines. But we have nearly lost sight of Mary Wollstonecraft. Can you name me, please, your father's grandmother? Aye, I thought not; then tell me the name of the man who is now Treasurer of the United States!

And so you see we do not know much about other people after all. But Mary Wollstonecraft pushed the question of woman's freedom to its farthest limit; I told you that she exhausted the subject. She prophesied a day when woman would have economic freedom; that is, be allowed to work at any craft or trade for which her genius fitted her and receive a proper recompense. Woman would also have social freedom: the right to come and go alone—the privilege of walking upon the street without the company of a man—the right to study and observe. Next, woman would have political freedom: the right to record her choice in matters of law-making. And last she would yet have sex freedom: the right to bestow her love without prying police and blundering law interfering in the delicate relations of married life.

To make herself understood Mary Wollstonecraft explained that society was tainted with the thought that sex was unclean; but she held high the ideal that this would yet pass away, and that the idea of holding one's mate by statute law would become abhorrent to all good men and women. She declared that the assumption that law could join a man and woman in holy wedlock was preposterous, and that the caging of one person by another for a lifetime was essentially barbaric. Only the love that is free and spontaneous and that holds its own by the purity, the sweetness, the tenderness and the gentleness of its life is divine. And further, she declared it her belief that when a man had found his true mate such a union would be for life—it could not be otherwise. And the man holding his mate by the excellence that was in him instead of by the aid of the law would be placed, lover-like, on his good behavior, and be a stronger and manlier being. Such a union, freed from the petty, spying, and tyrannical restraints of present usage must come ere the race could far advance.

Mary Wollstonecraft's book created a sensation. It was widely read and hotly denounced. A few upheld it: among these was William Godwin. But the air was so full of taunt and threat that Miss Wollstonecraft thought best to leave England for a time. She journeyed to Paris and there wrote and translated for certain English publishers. In Paris

she met Gilbert Imlay, an American, seemingly of very much the same temperament as herself. She was thirty-six, he was somewhat younger. They began housekeeping on the ideal basis. In a year a daughter was born to them. When this baby was three months old Imlay disappeared, leaving Mary penniless and friendless.

It was a terrible blow to this trusting and gentle woman. But after a good cry or two, philosophy came to her rescue and she decided that to be deserted by a man who did not love her was really not so bad as to be tied to him for life. She earned a little money and in a short time started back for England with her babe and scanty luggage—sorrowful yet brave and unsubdued. She might have left her babe behind, but she scorned the thought. She would be honest and conceal nothing. Right must win.

Now I am told that an unmarried woman with a babe at her breast is not received in England into the best society.

Mary W. Shelley

The tale of Mary's misfortune had preceded her and literary London laughed a hoarse guttural guffaw and society tittered to think how this woman who had written so smartly had tried some of her own medicine and found it bitter. Publishers no longer wanted her work, old friends failed to recognize her, and one man to whom she applied for work brought a rebuke upon his head, that lasted him for years.

Godwin, philosopher, idealist, enthusiast, and reformer, who made it his rule to seek out those in trouble, found her and told a needless lie by declaring he had been commissioned by a certain nameless publisher to get her to write certain articles about this and that. Then he emptied his pockets of all the small change he had as an advance payment, and he had n't very much, and started out to find the publisher who would buy the prospective "hot stuff." Fortunately he succeeded.

After a few weeks, Mr. Godwin,

Mary W. Shelley

bachelor, aged forty, found himself very much in love with Mary Wollstonecraft and her baby. Her absolute purity of purpose, her frankness, honesty and high ideals surpassed anything he had ever dreamed of finding incarnated in woman. He became her sincere lover ; and she, the discarded, the forsaken, reciprocated ; for it seems that the tendrils of affection, ruthlessly uprooted, cling to the first object that presents itself.

And so they were married ; yes, these two who had so generously repudiated the marriage tie were married March 29, 1797, at Old St. Pancras Church, for they had come to the sane conclusion that to affront society was not wise.

On August 30, 1797 was born to them a daughter. Then the mother died—died did brave Mary Wollstonecraft, and left behind a girl baby one week old. And this baby, grown to womanhood, became Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley.

III

GODWIN wrote one great book: Political Justice. It is a work so high and noble in its outlook that only a Utopia could ever realize its ideals. When men are everywhere willing to give to other men all the rights they demand for themselves, and co-operation takes the place of competition, then will Godwin's philosophy be not too great and good for daily food. Among the many who read his book and thought they saw in it the portent of a diviner day was one Percy Bysshe Shelley.

And so it came to pass that about the year 1813, this Percy Bysshe Shelley called on Godwin who was living in a rusty, musty tenement in Somerstown. The young man was twenty: tall and slender, with as handsome a face as was ever given to mortal. The face was pale as marble : the features almost feminine in their delicacy : thin lips, straight nose, good teeth, abundant, curling hair, and eyes so dreamy and sorrowful that women on the street would often turn and follow the " angel soul garbed in human form."

This man Shelley was sick at heart, bereft, perplexed, in sore straits, and to whom should he turn for advice in this time of undoing but to Godwin, the philosopher ! Besides, Godwin had been the husband of Mary Wollstonecraft, and the splendid precepts of these two had nourished into being all the latent excellence of the youth. Yes, he would go to Godwin—Godwin, the Plato of England !

And so he went to Godwin.

Now this young man Shelley was of noble blood. His grandfather was Sir Bysshe Shelley, Bart., and worth near three hundred thousand pounds, all of which would some day come to our pale-faced youth. But the youth was a republican—he believed in the brotherhood of man. He longed to benefit his fellows, to lift them out of the bondage of fear, and sin, and ignorance. After reading Hume, and Godwin, and Wollstonecraft, he had decided that Christianity as defined by the Church of England was a failure: it was only an organized fetich, kept in place by the state, and devoid of all that thrills to noble thinking and noble doing.

And so young Shelley at Oxford had written a pamphlet to this end, explaining the matter to the world.

A copy being sent to the head-master of the school, young Shelley was hustled off the premises in short order and a note sent to his father requesting that the lad be well flogged and kept several goodly leagues from Oxford.

Shelley the elder was furious that his son should so disgrace the family name, and demanded he should write another pamphlet supporting the Church of England and recanting all the heresy he had uttered. Young Percy replied that conscience would not admit of his doing this. The father said conscience be blanked: and further used almost the same words that were used by Professor Jowett some years later to a certain sceptical pupil.

Mary W. Shelley

Professor Jowett sent for the youth and said, "Young man, I am told that you say you cannot find God. Is this true?"

"Yes, sir," said the youth.

"Well, you will please find Him before eight o'clock to-night or get out of this college."

Shelley was not allowed to return home, and moreover his financial allowance was cut off entirely.

And so he wandered up to London and chewed the cud of bitter fancy, resolved to starve before he would abate one jot or tittle of what he thought was truth. And he might have starved had not his sisters sent him scanty sums of money from time to time. The messenger who carried the money to him was a young girl by the name of Harriet Westbrook, round and smooth and pink and sixteen. Percy was nineteen. Harriet was the daughter of an innkeeper and did not get along very well at home. She told Percy about it, and of course she knew his troubles, and so they talked about it over the gate, and mutually condoled with one another.

Soon after this Harriet had a fresh quarrel with her folks ; and with the tears yet on her pretty lashes ran straight to Shelley's lodging and throwing herself into his arms proposed that they cease to fight unkind fate, and run away together and be happy ever afterward.

And so they ran away.

Shelley's father instanced this as another proof of depravity and said, "Let 'em go!" The couple went to Scotland. In a few months they came back from Scotland, because no one can really be happy away from home. Besides they were out of money—and neither one had ever earned any money—and as the Westbrooks were willing to forgive, even if the Shelleys were not, they came back. But the Westbrooks were only willing to forgive in consideration of Percy and Harriet being properly married by a clergyman of the Church of England. Now Shelley had not wavered in his Godwin-Wollstonecraft theories, but he was chivalrous and Harriet was tearful, and so he gracefully waived all private considerations and they were duly married. It was a quiet wedding.

In a short time a baby was born.

Harriet was amiable, being healthy and having very moderate sensibilities. She had no opinion on any subject, and in no degree sympathized with Shelley's wild aspirations. She thought a title would be nice, and urged that her husband make peace by renouncing his "infidelity." Literature was silly business anyway, and folks should do as other folks did. If they did n't, lawks-a-daisy! there was trouble!!

And so, with income cut off, banished from home, from school, out of employment, with a wife who had no sympathy with him—who could not understand him

Mary W. Shelley

—whose pitiful weakness stung him and wrung him, he thought of Godwin, the philosopher: for at the last philosophy is the cure for all our ills.

Godwin was glad to see Shelley—Godwin was glad to see anyone. Godwin was fifty-five, bald, had a Socratic forehead, was smooth-cheeked, shabby, and genteel. Yes, Godwin was the author of Political Justice—but that was written quite a while before, twenty years!

One of the girls was sent out for a quart of half-and-half, and the pale visitor cast his eyes around this family room, that served for dining-room, library, and parlor. Godwin had married again,—Shelley had heard that, but he was a bit shocked to find that the great man who was once mate to Mary Wollstonecraft had married a shrew. The sound of her high-pitched voice convinced the visitor at once that she was a very commonplace person.

There were three girls and a boy in the room, busy at sewing or reading. None of them were introduced, but the air of the place was Bohemian, and the conversation soon became general. All talked except one of the girls : she sat reading, and several times when the young man glanced over her way she was looking at him. Shelley stayed an hour, spending a very pleasant time, but as he had no opportunity of stating his case to the philosopher he made an engagement to call again.

Mary W. Shelley

As he groped his way down stairs and walked homewards he mused. The widow Clairmont, whom Godwin had married, was a worldling, that was sure ; her daughter Jane was good-looking and clever, but both she and Charles, the boy, were the children of their mother—he had picked them out intuitively. The little young woman with brown eyes and merry ways was Faunny Godwin, the first child of Mary Wollstonecraft and adopted daughter of Godwin. The tall slender girl who was so very quiet was the daughter of Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft.

Mary W. Shelley

“Ye gods, what a pedigree!” said Shelley.

The young man called again, and after explaining his situation was advised to go back home and make peace with his wife and father at any cost of personal intellectual qualms. Philosophy was all right; but life was one thing and philosophy another. Live with Harriet as he had vowed to do,—love was a good deal glamour, anyway; write poetry, of course, if he felt like it, but keep it to himself. The world was not to be moved by enthusiastic youth. Godwin had tried it—he had been an enthusiastic youth himself, and that was why he now lived in Somerstown instead of Piccadilly. Move in the line of least resistance.

Shelley went away shocked and stunned. Going by Old St. Pancras Church he turned back to step in a moment and recover his scattered senses. He walked through the cool, dim old building, out into the churchyard, where toppling moss-covered gray slabs marked the resting-places of the sleeping dead. All seemed so cool and quiet and calm there! the dead are at rest: they have no vexatious problems.

A few people were moving about, carelessly reading the inscriptions. The young man unconsciously followed their example; he passed slowly along one of the walks, scanning the stones. His eye fell upon the word "Wollstonecraft," marked on a plain little slate slab. He paused and, leaning over, removed his hat and read, and then glancing just beyond, saw seated on the grass—the tall girl. She held a book in her hands, but she was looking at him very soberly. Their eyes met, and they smiled just a little. The young man sat down on the turf on the other side of the grave from the girl, and they talked of the woman by whose dust they watched: and the young man found that the tall girl was an Ancestor Worshipper and a mystic, and moreover, had a flight of soul that held him in awe. Besides, in form and feature, she was rarely beautiful. She was quiet, but she could talk.

The next day, as Percy Shelley strolled through the churchyard of Old St. Pancras, the tall girl was there again with her book, in the same place.

IV

WHEN Shelley made that first call at the Godwins he was twenty.

The three girls he met were fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, respectively. Mary being the youngest in years, but the most mature, she would have easily passed for the oldest. Now all three of these girls were dazzled by the beauty and grace and intellect of the strange, pale-faced visitor.

He came to the house again and again during the next few months. All the girls loved him violently, for that's the way girls under eighteen often love. Mr. Godwin discovered the fact that all of his girls loved Shelley. They lost appetite and were alternately in chills of fear and fevers of ecstasy. Mr. Godwin, being a kind man and a good, took occasion to explain to them that Mr. Shelley was a married man, and although it was true that he did not live on good terms with his wife, yet she was his lawful wife, and marriage was a sacred obligation: of course pure philosophy or poetic justice took a different view, but in society the marriage tie must not be held lightly. In short Shelley was married and that was all there was about it.

Shelley still continued to call, coming via St. Pancras Church. In a few months Mary confided to Jane that she and Shelley were about to elope, and Jane must make peace and explain matters after they were gone.

Jane cried and declared she would go too—she would go or die: she would go as servant, scullion—anything, but go she would. Shelley was consulted, and to prevent tragedy consented to Jane going as maid to Mary, his well-beloved.

So the trinity eloped. It being Shelley's second elopement he took the matter a little more coolly than did the girls, who had never eloped before. Having reached Dover, and while waiting at a hotel for the boat, the landlord suddenly appeared and breathlessly explained to Shelley, "a fat woman has just arrived and swears that you have run away with her girls!"

---

It was Mrs. Godwin.

The party got out by the back way and hired a small boat to take them to Calais. They embarked in a storm, and after beating about all night, came in sight of France the next morning as the sun arose.

Godwin was very much grieved and shocked to think that Shelley had broken in upon established order and done this thing. But Shelley had read Godwin's book and simply taken the philosopher at his word: "The impulses of the human heart are just and right; they are greater than law, and must be respected."

The runaways seemed to have had a jolly time in France as long as their money lasted. They bought a mule to carry their luggage, and walked. Jane's feet blistered, however, and they seated her upon the luggage upon the mule, and as the author of Queen Mab led the patient beast Mary with a switch followed behind. After some days Shelley sprained his ankle, and then it was his turn to ride while Mary led the mule and Jane trudged after.

Thus they journeyed for six weeks, writing poetry, discussing philosophy; loving, wild, free, and careless, until they came to Switzerland. One morning they counted their money and found they had just enough to take them to England.

Arriving in London the Godwins were not inclined to take them back, and society in general looked upon them with complete disfavor.

Shelley's father was now fully convinced of his son's depravity, but doled out enough money to prevent actual starvation. Shelley began to perceive that any man who sets himself against the established order—the order that the world has been thousands of years in building up—will be ground into the dust. The old world may be wrong but it cannot be righted in a day, and so long as a man chooses to live in society he must conform, in the main, to society usages. These old ways that have done good service all the years cannot be replaced by the instantaneous process. If changed at all they must change as man changes, and man must change first. It is man must be reformed, not custom.

Mary W. Shelley

Shelley and Mary Godwin were mates if ever such existed. In a year Mary had developed from a child into splendid womanhood—a beautiful, superior, earnest woman. By her own efforts, of course aided by Shelley, for they were partners in everything, she became versed in the classics and delved deeply into the literature of a time long past. Unlike her mother, Mary Shelley could do no great work alone. The sensitiveness and the delicacy of her nature precluded that self-reliant egoism which can create. She wrote one book—Frank- enstein—which in point of prophetic and allegorical suggestion stamps the work as classic : but it was written under the immediate spell of Shelley's presence. Shelley also could not work alone, and without her the world's disfavor must have whipped him into insanity and death.

As it was they sought peace in love and Italy, living near Lord Byron in great intimacy and befriended by him in many ways.

But peace was not for Shelley. Calamity was at the door. He could never forget how he had lifted Harriet Westbrook into a position for which she was not fitted and then left her to flounder alone. And when word came that Harriet had drowned herself, his cup of woe was full. Shortly before this Fanny Godwin had gone away with great deliberation, leaving an empty laudanum bottle to tell the tale.

On December 30, 1816, Shelley and Mary Godwin were married at St. Mildred's Church, London. Both had now fully concluded with Godwin that man owes a duty to the unborn and to society, and that to place one's self in opposition to custom is at least very bad policy.

Mary W. Shelley

But although Shelley had made society tardy amends, society would not forgive ; and in a long legal fight to obtain possession of his children, Iauthe and Charles, of whom Harriet was the mother, the Court of Chancery decided against Shelley, on the grounds that he was "an unfit person, being an atheist and a republican."

About this time was born little Allegra, "the Dawn," child of Lord Byron and Jane Clairmont. Then afterwards came bickerings with Byron and threats of a duel and all that.

Finally there was a struggle between Byron and Miss Clairmont for the child : but death solved the issue and the beautiful little girl passed beyond the reach of either.

Mary W. Shelley

And so we find Shelley's heart wrung by the sorrows of others and by his own ; and when Mary and he laid away in death their bright boy William and their baby girl, Clara, the fates seemed to have done their worst. But man seems to have a certain capacity for pain and beyond this even God cannot go.

Shelley struggled on and with Mary's help continued to write.

Another babe was born and the world grew brighter. They were now on the shores of the Mediterranean with a little group of enthusiasts who thought and felt as they did. For the first time they realized that, after all, they were a part of the world, and linked to the human race—not set off alone, despised, forsaken.

Then to join their little community were coming Leigh Hunt and his wife—Leigh Hunt, who had lain in prison for the right of free thought and free speech. What a joy to greet and welcome such a man to their home !

And so Shelley, blithe and joyous, sailed

away to meet his friend. But Shelley never came back to his wife and baby boy. A few days after, the waves cast his body up on the beach, and you know the rest—how the faithful Trelawney and Byron made the funeral pyre and reduced the body to ashes.

Mary was twenty-six years old then. She continued to live—to live only in the memory of her Shelley and with the firm thought in her mind that they would be again united. She seemed to exist but to care for her boy, and to do as best she could the work that Shelley had left undone.

The boy grew into a fine youth, and was as devoted to his mother as she was to him. The title of the estate with all its vast wealth descended to him and together she lived out her days, tenderly cared for to the last, dying in her son's arms, aged fifty-four.

She has told us that the first sixteen years of her life were spent in waiting for her Shelley, eight years she lived with him in divinest companionship, and twenty-eight years she waited and worked to prepare herself to rejoin him.

Little Journeys to the Homes of Famous Women            American Authors

Good Men and Great    American Statesmen Eminent Painters

Each fully illustrated. 16°, gilt tops,
5 vols. in a box, $8.75.

Also sold separately, each . . . $1.75

"The series is well conceived and excellently sustained. The most captious critic could not suggest an improvement. Never was there more satisfactory packing, in more attractive shape, of matter worth at least ten times the money."—Buffalo Commercial.

"The charm of Mr. Hubbard's style, one third narrative, two-thirds whimsical philosophy and character study—nowhere blank biography or guide-book description—is as manifest in his 'Homes of Famous Women' as in his 'Homes of Good Men and Great.' In truth, he is freer, lighter in touch, more gracious in humor in this than in the preceding volumes. The 'Little Journeys' unpretentious as they are, are literature, and will live and quicken the minds of readers when the biographies are dust."—Journal of Education.

BELLES-LETTRES.

Browning, Poet and Man. A Survey.

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY, author of "Tennyson ; His Homes, His Friends, and His Works." With 25 illustrations in photogravure and some text illustrations. Large 8°, gilt top, in a box.

This volume forms a companion work to Miss Cary's book on Tennyson issued last year, which met with such a cordial reception.

Impressions of Spain.

By JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL. Edited by JOSEPH B. GILDER. Introduction by A. A. ADEE. With portrait. 12°, gilt top.

These impressions of Spain were gathered by Mr. Lowell while Minister to that country. He was a close observer of men and of things, and the letters which make up this volume (letters which have been selected from the series addressed to the Department of State) are of special interest not only because of their subject-matter, but also because of the form in which they are presented.

Rip Van Winkle.

The Legend of Sleepy Hollow.

By WASHINGTON IRVING. The two volumes contain 15 full-page photogravures and numerous text-cuts by FREDERICK S. COBURN. With title-page and borders in colors, and cover designs, designed especially for this edition by MARGARET ARMSTRONG. 2 vols., 8°, gilt top.

These two little classics from the pen of Irving, "The Father of American Letters," can never fail to interest the reader. The stories have been given a most artistic setting, the borders having been designed by Miss Margaret Armstrong and the illustrations by the well-known artist, Frederick Simpson Coburn.

Famous Homes of Great Britain and their Stories.

Edited by A. H. MALAN. Being descriptions of twelve of the Famous Homes of England. Among the writers are the Duke of Marlborough, the Duchess of Cleveland, Lady Dudley, Lady Newton, Lady Warwick, Hugh Campbell, and A. H. Malan. With 200 full-page illustrations. 1 vol., royal 8°, gilt top, 450 pages.

CONTENTS :

Alnwick.	Hardwick.	Belvoir Castle.
Blenheim.	Chatsworth.	Battle Abbey.
Charlecote.	Lyme.	Holland House.
Penshurst.	Cawdor Castle.	Warwick Castle.

Romance of the Feudal Châteaux.

By ELIZABETH W. CHAMPNEY. Fully illustrated with photogravure, half-tone, and line plates. Large 8°, gilt top.

Mrs. Champney has chosen a few of the Feudal Châteaux as typical. She writes sympathetically concerning the ruins of these châteaux and the traditions which cling to them. Some of these traditions were told to her by simple people on the spot; others she has derived from the old chronicles, reading a little between the lines, and seeing things which, written in that magical sympathetic ink, are too faded and faint to reach the eye of the searcher for authenticated statistics.

Where Ghosts Walk.

The Haunts of Familiar Characters in History and Literature. By MARION HARLAND. With 33 illustrations. 8°, gilt top, in a box, $2.50.

"In this volume fascinating pictures are thrown upon the screen so rapidly that we have not time to have done with our admiration for one before the next one is encountered. . . . Long-forgotten heroes live once more; we recall the honored dead to life again, and the imagination runs riot. Travel of this kind does not weary, it fascinates."—New York Times.

HOLIDAY BOOKS.

Love-Letters of a Musician.

By MYRTLE REED. 8°, gilt top.

A collection of imaginary epistles addressed by a young violinist to his lady during the year following his rejection, and with a curious fancy, posted in his trunk. The musician's illness, and the friends who find the letters, make the happy ending possible.

Miss Reed has suited the mood of each letter to a musical theme, which is expressed not only by the appropriate tempo placed at the head of each chapter, but by bars of music chosen from compositions which approach very nearly the spirit of each chapter, and thus makes the "Love-Letters" suitable for musical readings.

Sleepy-Time Stories.

By MAUD B. BOOTH (Mrs. Ballington Booth). With a preface by CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW. Illustrated by MAUD HUMPHREY. 8°, gilt top.

Mr. Depew writes in his preface: "In the dreary desert of child-lore, it is like an oasis to the thirsty soul to find so bright, loving, and natural an interpreter and instructor as Mrs. Ballington Booth. . . . In putting into print for others these treasures of her own nursery she has made all children her debtors."

Ariel Booklets.

A series of productions complete in small compass, which have been accepted as classics of their kind. With photogravure frontispiece. Red leather, 32°, gilt top, each 75 cents.

Literary Hearthstones.

Studies of the Home Life of Certain Writers and Thinkers. Put up in sets of two volumes each, in boxes. Fully illustrated. 16°, gilt top.

The first issues will be :

Charlotte Brontë. William Cowper.

In this series, Marion Harland presents, not dry biographies, but, as indicated in the sub-title, studies of the home-life of certain writers and thinkers. The volumes will be found as interesting as stories, and, indeed, they have been prepared in the same method as would be pursued in writing a story, that is to say, with a due sense of proportion.

Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories.

Fully illustrated. 8°, gilt top, in a box, $3.00.

More Colonial Homesteads and their Stories.

Fully illustrated. 8°, gilt top, in a box, $3.00.

In the hands of Marion Harland, the old mansions glow with the old-time warmth and hospitality; and their halls are peopled once more with the characters who had their part in building up the nation.

The Yang-Tse Valley and Beyond.

An Account of Journeys in Central and Western China, especially in the Province of Tze-Chuan, and among the Mant-Zu of the Tsu-Kuh-Shaw Mountains. By ISABELLA L. BIRD (Mrs. Bishop), F.R.G.S., author of "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan," etc. With maps and about 100 full-page illustrations from photographs by the author. 2 vols., 8°.

A Prisoner of the Khaleefa.

Twelve Years' Captivity at Omdurman. By CHARLES NEUFELD. With 36 illustrations. 8°.

This very important book gives Mr. Neufeld's own account of his experiences during his twelve years' captivity at Omdurman. He set out from Cairo in 1887 on a trading expedition to Kordofan, but was betrayed by his Arab guides into the hands of the Der-vishes, and carried by his captors to the Khaleefa at Omdurman. There he was thrown into prison, loaded with fetters, led out for execution, and threatened with instant death unless he would embrace the tenets of Mahdism, but was spared for reasons of the Khaleefa's own, and kept a close prisoner. He gives the most vivid account of his life in the prison, of his fellow-prisoners, of the Kaleefa's government, and of his own attempts to escape.

Quaint Corners of Ancient Empires.

Southern India, Burma, and Manila. By MICHAEL MYERS SHOEMAKER, author of "Islands of the Southern Seas," etc. Fully illustrated. 8°, gilt top.

In this new volume the author takes his readers on a flying trip through Southern India and Burma—those relics of ancient empires which are fast changing under the swift progress of civilization. From Burma Mr. Shoemaker went to Manila, and was able to gather much interesting material concerning this section of the Philippines. No spot upon the globe is of more interest to Americans at the present day than Manila, and it is essential that the real condition of things should be clearly understood.
